QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

City Corporation Lunches.

Dr. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the hon. Member for the Elland Division of Yorkshire, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether the Commissioners' attention has been called to the fact that the members of the Committees of the City Corporation are allowed at each sitting a half-crown lunch, a fixed sum also being allowed for drink; that the cost of these luncheons amounted to £3,000 or £4,000 a year; that this money is voted out of a fund known as the City Cash, the proceeds of bequests made long ago; whether the Commissioners have power to inquire as to the purpose to which the income of old bequests is at present applied; whether, if the intentions of the donors cannot be carried out, the Commissioners can require a scheme to be drawn up devoting the income to the public good; whether the Commissioners have approved of any scheme allowing the income of these City bequests to be spent in refreshments; and, if not, will the Commissioners at once make inquiry and consider the advisability of devoting the income derived from these bequests to some useful public purpose.

(Answered by Mr. Trevelyan.) The Commissioners understand that the term "the City's cash" is applied to property belonging to the Corporation of the City of London which, except to a comparatively small extent, is not subject to charitable trusts. The particulars of the charities comprised in the City's cash are mentioned in the Reports to the Commissioners on the Charities in the Administrative County of London, vol. 7. Except as to these charities, it does not appear that the Commissioners have power to inquire into the origin and application of the City's cash.

London Unemployed Grant.

SIR A. SPICER (Hackney, Central): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state, in connection with the money allocated to London out of the grant of £200,000 voted by Parliament for contributions in aid of expenses under the Unemployed Workmen's Act, 1905, the number of men helped, the numbers in each branch of trade, the rate of wages paid, and the duration of employment.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I understand that the number of men assisted out of the money received by the Central (Unemployed) Body for London from the grant, between 10th November, 1906, and 31st March, 1907, was 2,821. The exact figures as to the trades in which the men are usually employed cannot at present be given. The wages paid have varied from 20s. to 21s. per week, and the average duration of the employment on the various works has varied from four weeks to eight and a half weeks.

Condemned Tinned Goods.

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, at a recent auction in the City of London (21st March, 1907), a large quantity of tinned goods were offered for sale, some of which were seized and destroyed as unfit for food by the port sanitary authority in whose district they were lying, although the owner of the goods stated that some of these goods were returned military stores from South Africa; and whether he is aware that a quantity of these goods are still in this country and on the way, and that arrangements are apparently being made to put them on the market from time to time at the rate of one-halfpenny per pound after expense of freight, storage, etc., has been paid; and whether, under these circumstances, he will take such steps as may be necessary in the interests of public health to prevent such sales.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The facts appear to be generally as stated. Further legislation of the kind contemplated by the Public Health (Regulations as to Food) Bill now before Parliament is necessary for the proper dealing with a matter of this kind, but in the particular instance mentioned attention was given by the local authorities concerned to the condition of the goods sold at the auction. A special notice was exhibited at the auction to the effect that they were sold subject to being passed by the medical officer of health of the district in which they were lying; and steps were taken by the medical officers of health of the City and Port of London, of Stepney, and of Finsbury to obtain the surrender of such articles of food as were considered to be unfit for human consumption.

Irish Financial Relations.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the total amount of taxation raised in Ireland in the financial years 1841, 1851, 1861, 1871, 1881, 1891, 1901, and 1906 respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) For the purposes of the Financial Relations Returns, Ireland's true contribution to Revenue was worked out for the last financial year of each decade since the amalgamation of the British and Irish Exchequers. It is not clear which financial years the hon. Member refers to in his Question, but presumably those shown in the subjoined statement are sufficiently near.

Financial Year.	Tax Revenue contributed by Ireland.

Cost of Government.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state, from the last available statistics, the total annual cost, and the rate per head of the population of England and Wales, under each of the following heads: Office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Local Government Board for England and Wales, Judiciary, Police, and Education, together with the cost of Civil Government in England and Wales, with the rate per head of the population.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The subjoined statement shows the cost of the respective services, so far as they are charged on the Votes of Parliament or the Consolidated Fund, for the financial year 1905–6. The figures are taken from the statement of net cost appended to the volume of Appropriation Accounts, with adjustments, where necessary, to exclude Scottish or Irish services charged on the English Votes:—

Home Office	175,672	0 1¼
Local Government Board	215,946	0 1½
Board of Education	12,726,000	7 5½
Universities and Colleges	169,647	0 1¼

The total of the charges of Civil Government for England and Wales in the year 1905–6, as shown on page 12 of House of Commons Paper, No. 278, of 1906, was £17,898,000, or 10s. 5¾d. per head of population. For information as to the cost of education beyond the charge upon the Parliamentary Votes, I beg leave to refer the hon. Member to the Board of Education, and to the Home Office as regards the cost of police, which is not a direct charge on Imperial funds.

Irish Contribution to Imperial Expenditure.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the cost of Irish services defrayed out of Imperial funds has increased from £5,939,000 in 1895–6 to £7,635,000 in 1905–6; and whether he can state under what heads the increase has been made up, and how much under each head.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The grants to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account have risen from £394,000 to £1,445,000, or by £1,051,000. The cost of Post Office services in Ireland has risen from £808,000 to £1,199,000, or by £391,000. The remainder of the increase (£254,000) is the balance of the movements upward and downward on the remaining Votes for Irish services. It is more than accounted for by the addition of the Ireland Development Grant (£185,000) and the increase (£91,000) in the cost of the Irish Land Commission.

Silver Currency for the West Indies.

Mr. O. C. PHILIPPS (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury how much profit has been made out of the silver currency shipped to the West Indian Colonies and British Guiana during the last twenty years.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The estimated profit, representing the difference between the bullion value and the coined value of the silver supplied, may be taken as £400,000; but it must be remembered that the Imperial Government accepts the liability for the redemption of worn coins at their full nominal value.

Dublin Assistant Clerks.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any representations have recently been made to him for promotion of assistant clerks serving in Dublin offices; whether assurances have been given by his predecessors that any cases in which assistant clerks are represented by the heads of their departments to be engaged on the work of Second Division clerks the question of raising their salaries would be considered; whether, in at least one recent case, a clerk with nearly twelve years total service and a salary of less than £100 a year, has had a recommendation for promotion indefinitely postponed; and whether he will apply to this case the precedent given in the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction in which a minimum salary of £120 was given to clerks of long service, small salaries, and meritorious conduct.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I have traced one case which appears to answer to the description given in the Question. The facts in that case are that the head of the Department recommended an assistant clerk for promotion to the Second Division, and the Treasury in reply stated that they did not feel able to take the application into consideration before the occurrence of a vacancy to which he could be appointed, either in his own or in some other Department. I am not aware of any ground for increasing the salary of the clerk in question.

Electric Power for the Navy.

Mr. HADDOCK (Lancashire, North Lonsdale): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty in respect of what naval establishment the provisions for electric light and power under the Act of 1905 has been reduced by £200,000.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The reduction has been distributed pro rata over the whole of the naval establishments, and is not confined to any one.

Cost of Torpedo Ranges.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty why the total Estimate in the Act of 1905 for £320,000 in connection with torpedo ranges has been reduced by more than 100 per cent.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) After much investigation the Admiralty expect to be able to meet their requirements with the reduced total Estimate mentioned.

Indian Section, Imperial Institute.

Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has arrived at a decision in respect of the future position and constitution of the Indian section of the Imperial Institute; and, if so, whether any information on this subject can be furnished to the House.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative. The matter is still under my consideration. For the present, and until a decision has been arrived at, the section will continue to be managed by the Indian Committee.

Lieutenant-Colonels' Pay.

Mr. HADDOCK: To ask the Secretary of State for War what sum has been taken in the Estimates for 1907–8 to meet the increased pay of lieutenant-colonels.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) A sum of money has been taken in the Estimates to meet this service. I am in communication with the Treasury as to the rate of increase per arm, and I am not yet able to state the exact figures.

Territorial Force—Cost of Uniform.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the estimated cost for providing 300,000 men of the territorial force with one new suit of clothes (service dress) for each man enrolled, together with boots, head-dress, overcoat, etc.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The cost of a new suit of service dress for infantry, including great coat, boots, helmet, cap, and badge and putties would amount to a sum of £2 17s. 3d. per man, or about £858,750 for 300,000 men.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Indian Trade Journal.

*Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Indian Trade Journal issued by the Commercial Department of the Government of India, not only disseminates useful information, but expresses opinions and pronounces upon controversial commercial questions and appreciations of particular manufacturing processes and plant; whether the Government of India is responsible for such opinions, pronouncements, and appreciations; and whether he will consider the desirability of not allowing a Government publication, unlike the Board of Trade Journal, to compete in this behalf with private newspapers, journals, and other publications.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Morley, Montrose Burghs): I understand that the editor of the Indian Trade Journal is not restricted to compiling extracts, but may comment on commercial subjects. The public have been informed so lately as February, 1907, that opinions and suggestions thus inserted in the Journal are those of the editor, not of the Government. The Government of India have allowed this latitude in order that the Journal may keep in touch with Indian trade. I have no information that it competes improperly with private journals, and I do not propose to interfere in the matter.

Bimlipatam.

*Mr. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the project for connecting Bimlipatam with the East Coast Railway by a branch line, which was formerly approved by the Government of India, and was indeed part of the original East Coast Railway project, is still alive or has lapsed, to the detriment of one of the few practicable ports on the coast of Coromandel and to the loss of the trade of Bimlipatam, which has been created by the enterprise of generations of European and Indian merchants.

Mr. MORLEY: The project for constructing the line in question by private agency has lapsed, and I am not aware that the Government of India have any intention of constructing it as a State line.

*Mr. REES: Could a private company make a tramway there, or has the concession completely lapsed?

Mr. MORLEY: I understand it has completely lapsed, but I will inquire as to that.

Slavery in Zanzibar.

Mr. BYLES (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can see his way to signalise the passing of the Slave Trade Prohibition Act 100 years ago by putting an end to the legal status of slavery in Zanzibar coast strip.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. Churchill, Manchester, N.W.): On 7th January the Secretary of State for the Colonies addressed a despatch to the officer administering the Government of the East Africa Protectorate intimating that, in his opinion, the time had come to abolish the legal status of slavery in the mainland as well as in the island dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and requesting him to furnish a report upon the question of the most convenient measures to be taken to carry that policy into effect. It was also impressed upon the officer in question that Lord Elgin was anxious that the matter should be proceeded with as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. BYLES: Is not this the only spot under the British flag where the institution of slavery enjoys the protection of the British flag?

Mr. CHURCHILL was understood to say that, so far as he knew, it was the only place under the control of the Colonial Office.

British Coloured Subjects in the Congo.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the communication to the Foreign Office from the Congo Reform Association, dated 5th February, in regard to the ill-treatment of British coloured subjects and violation of the clauses of the Brussels Act in regard to the importation of firearms in the Upper Welle district (north-eastern region of the Congo State); and, if so, what steps His Majesty's Government are taking in regard to the matter.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Runciman, Dewsbury; for Sir Edward Grey): The allegations in regard to the ill-treatment of British coloured subjects in the Congo State were contained in a précis of a petition stated to have been delivered to the Sub-Commissioner of the Nile Province in the presence of the gentleman who brought the matter to the notice of the Congo Reform Association. My right hon. friend referred the matter to the Colonial Office, and a report has been called for from the local authorities. With regard to the reported importation of firearms into the north-eastern portion of the Congo State it is considered that a favourable opportunity of discussing the whole question of the importation of arms and ammunition into Africa will be afforded at the Arms Conference which is to meet next spring at Brussels.

The Channel Tunnel.

Mr. BYLES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been directed to the surprise and disappointment generally expressed in France at the Government's opposition to the Channel Tunnel scheme; has he received any communications from the French Government in the same sense; and can he assure the House that the cordiality of the entente with France is not impaired.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: My right hon. friend has received no communication from the French Government on the subject, but he understands that the reasons for our reluctance to sanction the scheme are well understood and entirely appreciated in France. And he would draw the attention of the hon. Member to the statement of the Prime Minister that:—"His Majesty's Government fully recognise the deep concern felt in this matter, and have no other desire than to take the House fully into their confidence, even in anticipation of the early stages of the Bill. Briefly I may say that our view of the public interest leads us to be opposed to this project of a tunnel. Even supposing the military dangers involved were to be amply guarded against, there would exist throughout the country a feeling of insecurity which might lead to a constant demand for increased expenditure, naval and military, and a continual risk of unrest and possibly alarm, which, however unfounded, would be most injurious in its effect, whether political or commercial. On the other hand, there has not been disclosed any such prospect of advantage to the trade and industries of the country as would compensate for those evils. As to the personal convenience of passengers and the transit of light articles, it seems well that further consideration should be given to other means of conveyance, such as are used in the ferries across great channels of the sea in other parts of the world. These considerations lead us, while rejoicing in anything that facilitates free communication with our neighbours, to view this project with disfavour." It is quite out of the question that such a statement could have any unfavourable consequences.

Vaccination Exemption Certificates.

Mr. GODDARD CLARKE (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Mr. Edmund J. Green, of 101, Peckham Park Road, S.E., was refused by the magistrate at Lambeth police court a certificate of exemption from vaccination, although he stated that he conscientiously believed that vaccination would be detrimental to the health of his child; and will he take steps to bring before the magistrates the views of the Lord Chief Justice as to their duties under the conscience clause of The Vaccination Act, 1898, pending such alteration of the law as the Government have in contemplation.

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Gladstone, Leeds, W.): I have no information of the facts of this particular case; but the law requires an applicant to satisfy the magistrate that he conscientiously believes that vaccination will be injurious to the child in question, and therefore I cannot take any action in the matter. The magistrates are well aware of the views of the Lord Chief Justice on the subject.

Church Army Workshops.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the workshops occupied by the Church Army, in which articles are adapted for sale precisely in the same way as in other workplaces, are registered by the factory inspectors; whether these places have been regularly visited by Government inspectors; and whether the provisions of the Factory Act are complied with.

MR. GLADSTONE: These places have not, I understand, been registered as factories or workshops. The application of the Factory Act depends, not merely on whether articles are adapted for sale, but also on whether the work is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain; and it would not seem that institutions of the kind referred to can be said to be carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain. The inspectors have, however, from time to time paid visits to such institutions where industrial work is regularly carried on, and among them to the Church Army Homes, and given advice, and I am informed that the provisions of the Factory Act are generally well observed.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that these institutions are not carried on by way of profit?

MR. GLADSTONE: So far as I know. If the hon. Member can show me to the contrary, I shall, of course, be glad to receive information.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the goods produced in these factories really compete in the open market?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, I am aware of that; but it does not follow that the workshops of the Church Army are carried on for purposes of gain.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to legislate on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE said he would consider the point.

Royal Patriotic Fund Offices.

MR. BYLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, is the Government responsible for the rent of the Royal Patriotic Fund premises, Seymour House, Pall Mall; and on what Vote on the Estimates is it placed.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Under an arrangement made in 1904, which was to hold for fourteen years, an allowance of £600 a year is paid to the Royal Patriotic Fund Commission from the Vote for Public Buildings, Great Britain, to cover rent, rates and taxes, fuel, light, water, and any incidental expenses. Previously to this arrangement the Commission had received accommodation at the public expense rent and rate free.

MR. BYLES: Is it possible to criticise the action of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners on that Vote?

MR. RUNCIMAN: That is a matter for the Chairman to decide.

SUPPLY [5TH ALLOTTED DAY].

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £43,400, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1908, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) called attention to the item for restoring the panelling at the Orangery at Kensington Palace, and also asked if anything was being done in regard to the Grinling Gibbons' carving there. Some nine years ago when the restoration of the building took place, many coats of paint were removed from the panelling. History related that the original intention of Sir Christopher Wren had been to carry out the pannelling in oak, but that design was, owing to the niggardliness of the Lord High Treasurer of the day, refused, as was later an application for paint to cover the deal. To show the building as originally left a coat of clear varnish was put over the panelling, but it was not intended that it should remain so. He wished to know to what extent restoration was necessary, and whether painting it had been decided upon.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland) asked what was proposed to be done to Holyrood Palace, and whether the restoration of the chapel at that palace was included in the Vote; also whether King's Park, Stirling, came under the same heading.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.) said that as there was an item for the upkeep of the residential apartments at St. James's Palace, he wished to draw attention to a matter which was nothing short of a public scandal. The gentleman of the Cellars to the King, Mr. Kingscote, who occupied apartments in the Palace, and received a large salary from His Majesty's Privy Purse, was also in the employment of a foreign firm of champagne shippers, and received from them a salary of several thousands a year in order, he supposed, to push their brand of champagne at the Court.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he did not think the point raised by the hon. Member had anything to do with the Vote before the Committee.

MR. LEA: The gentleman is in the occupation of apartments in St. James's Palace.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the Committee has anything to do with that.

MR. LEA: May I point out that these apartments, which are at present occupied by this gentleman, might be used for some other purpose?

Mr. Akers-Douglas.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Committee does not allocate these apartments nor does the Minister whose Estimates we are discussing. The matter is out of order.

MR. LEA: But the Committee pays for them.

MR. C. E. PRICE (Edinburgh, Central) asked if anything could be done to restore the original stone work of Buckingham Palace, which was at present covered with coats of paint. If the paint could be removed and the original stone uncovered it would be a great improvement. The stone had been quarried near Edinburgh, and nothing was more offensive to a Scotsman than to see it covered with five or six coats of paint.

MR. MORTON asked the First Commissioner of Works whether he could tell the Committee under what conditions the champagne vendor already mentioned occupied his position at St. James' Palace.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale) said before he replied in detail he wished to make an appeal on similar lines to that which he made last year; viz., that the Committee would allow all the Votes to pass that night with the exception of that for his own salary. The reason why he made the request was that the Office of Works was in a peculiar position with regard to these Votes. If the Votes were held over until August he would have lost a great deal of the best weather for building purposes, which would be an unsatisfactory state of affairs. With regard to the Orangery of Kensington Palace, which had been mentioned by the right hon. Member for St. Augustine's, a strong alkali pickle was unfortunately used in the previous renovation; that had injuriously affected the woodwork and caused an appearance of mildew, which it had been found impossible to remove. In consequence of the poor condition of the panelling they had decided to re-do it in the way it was no doubt done by Sir Christopher Wren, and paint it white.

He could also assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Grinling Gibbons carving would be touched very tenderly, if at all. In answer to the hon. Member for Sutherland, King's Park at Stirling did not come under the Vote. With regard to Holyrood Chapel, they had always taken the necessary steps for the preservation of the ruins; but as for restoration and rebuilding, that was a matter with which he was not officially concerned. It was left that the work should be carried out by a specified architect and trustees, and failing action on the part of those gentlemen the moneys to be devoted to that purpose should lapse. They had lapsed. After the ruling of the Chairman, the hon. Member for St. Pancras would not expect him to say anything about the subject he had raised, and as a matter of fact, he did not think it was a matter about which he could say anything.

MR. LEA asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that Mr. Kingscote acted as wine and spirit buyer to the Great Northern Railway, and that until eighteen months ago his letters were dated from St. James' Palace and bore the Royal Arms.

*MR. HARCOURT said he had no knowledge of the matter. With regard to the painting of the Scottish stone of Buckingham Palace, the stone used was so bad that it would not stand the English climate and the face crumbled away. For that reason the stone had to be treated with the preparation to which the hon. Member for Central Edinburgh had referred.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said the appeal the right hon. Gentleman had made was not an unusual one, and during the time he himself held the office of First Commissioner of Works he often had occasion to make a similar appeal. He was certain the Committee would recognise the reasonableness of the proposal. If they were to hold back their sanction to these Votes until August the building works would be seriously affected. It was important that the Votes should be passed, and he for one would raise no objection. He took it, however, that if the right hon. Gentleman's Votes were assented to by the Committee the Government did not intend to take any other business that night. He congratulated the First Commissioner of Works upon his answer with regard to the Orangery.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire) asked whether any steps had been taken to preserve the Bore stone on the Field at Bannockburn.

*MR. HARCOURT said he recognised the interest taken in the stone by Scotsmen generally, and he had written to the proprietor on whose ground it stood suggesting that it should be placed under the care of the Office of Works. The reply he received was that the proprietor was unwilling to assent to such an arrangement and that the stone was properly cared for as it was; consequently he had no further powers in the matter.

*MR. MORTON asked what the right hon. Gentleman intended to do with regard to Holyrood Palace. A great deal required to be done to the palace to put it into a decent respectable state and one worthy of the United Kingdom. It was one of those palaces which were taken over at the time of the Union, with the undertaking that it should always be kept in repair out of funds to be provided by the United Kingdom. He wanted to know what steps the Government intended to take to put the palace in as good a condition as the Royal palaces in England, so that it might no longer be the disgrace it was at the present time.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) called attention to an item of £300 for the building of sheds for lawn mowers at Windsor. It seemed to him a very large amount to spend for such a purpose. He himself had built a shed 60 feet long and 30 feet wide with a corrugated iron roof, for about £40. There was also another item he had noticed, viz., the sum of £500 for a new fire alarm system at St. James' Palace. As far as he could gather it was not a system of fire prevention, including fire hydrants, etc., but merely an alarm system, by which communication could be obtained with the fire station. If the right hon. Gentleman could give them some explanation on the matter he would feel obliged.

*Mr. HARCOURT said that as far as Holyrood Palace was concerned, he spent some time there last August and he did not form such a bad opinion as the hon. Member for Sutherland entertained of its state of repair. It was quite clear that as far as the historical apartments were concerned, the less they did the better, so long as they just did enough to keep them going. What he desired to do was not to hand the palace over to restorers, but simply to preserve what there was; a few changes had been made, such as putting a new lamp in the quadrangle and repairing the sun-dial. With regard to the proposed shed for lawn mowers at Windsor the sum did appear rather a large one, but the mowers were large machines, considerable in number, with a large acreage to deal with. The Committee might rest assured that he would not spend more upon decorative building of that sort than was absolutely necessary to make it effective for its purpose, and at the same time to prevent its being an eyesore to, and an outrage upon the beautiful gardens around it. In the matter of the fire alarm system at St. James's Palace, the hon. Baronet seemed to be under the impression that they were simply putting up a bell which would communicate with the fire station.

Sir F. BANBURY: It certainly gives one that impression.

*Mr. HARCOURT said that was not so. It was really a complete system of fire alarms throughout all the passages and rooms of the Palace. It was a system which would replace one which was quite antiquated.

Sir F. BANBURY agreed that everything necessary should be done to provide for the safety of the palace, and he was quite content with the right hon. Gentleman's explanation. With regard to the shed for lawn mowers at Windsor, he was sure that no one would wish to destroy the amenities of one of the most beautiful palaces in Europe. He did not contemplate the putting up of an iron shed, but he would point out that close to the ground where the mowers would be used there were extensive shrubberies, and he thought that possibly a shed could be erected there which need not be of quite such an artistic and expensive character as that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He was, however quite willing to accept the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the interests of economy had not been forgotten, his object in bringing the matter forward having been to obtain an explanation of the item. On the subject of Holyrood Palace, he intended to give his support to the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Sutherland, apparently, wanted Holyrood Palace put into a perfect state of repair.

Mr. MORTON said he asked for a decent, not perfect, state of repair.

*Mr. MORTON: Have you ever been there?

Sir F. BANBURY admitted that he had not, but he was prepared to take the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, in preference to that of the hon. Member for Sutherland. To put the palace in "decent" repair might mean the expenditure of £50,000 or £100,000, for when they started to repair old buildings they never knew when they were going to stop. He was astonished that the hon. Member should have made such a proposal, and he appealed to him not to lose that spirit of economy which so distinguished him when he sat for an English constituency.

Mr. MORTON said that the hon. Baronet's memory must be a very bad one. If he would read the Hansard reports of the date he had mentioned he would find that the question of repairing the Scottish palaces and castles was then discussed at much greater length than it was their intention to discuss it that night. He had a greater faith in the present First Commissioner of Works than he had in his predecessors, and before the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London attempted to criticise his (Mr. Morton's) action in the matter he should visit the spot and then perhaps he would be in a position to criticise his (Mr. Morton's) remarks. Nothwithstanding the fact that the hon. Baronet was going to support the Government in the matter, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would realise that they in Scotland expected, now they had a good First Commissioner of Works, that he would look after these matters and treat Scotland at least as well as England.

MR. LEA moved a reduction of the vote by £3,240 as a protest against a gentleman in the employ of a French champagne firm occupying apartments at St. James Palace at the public expense.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item E be reduced by £3,240."—(Mr. Lea.)

*MR. HARCOURT said he wished to make a serious protest against the hon. Member's Motion. He hoped Parliament was not going to step beyond its own limitations in the matter. In consideration of certain properties which were handed over to the State certain residences were transferred to His Majesty to be treated absolutely under his own control. There was no possible justification for dealing with the exercise of His Majesty's right of gift in these matters, and he hoped the Committee would not attempt to go into matters with which they really had no concern. He hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion, which was to delete the sum required for the repair of the Palace as a whole.

MR. LEA said he was very loth to refuse the request of the right hon. Gentleman, but he felt convinced that, whatever limitations Parliament imposed upon itself when the Civil List was arranged, it was never in contemplation——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. I allowed the explanation so that the matter might be made clear, but I cannot allow it to be discussed.

SIR F. BANBURY asked if it would be in order to protest against the reduction.

*THE CHAIRMAN said the hon. Baronet could protest against the reduction on its merits, but he could not go into the arguments which appeared to be in the mind of the hon. Member who moved the reduction.

SIR F. BANBURY said that the Chairman's ruling limited him considerably, but he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it was most inopportune that such a reduction should be moved. It was really a private arrangement of His Majesty's. He would have great pleasure in supporting the Government, and he hoped the Committee would not attempt to interfere in the matter.

MR. LEA said he would withdraw his Motion, but he hoped that representations would be made in the proper quarter——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is constantly trying to get round my ruling.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. £9,100, to complete the sum for Osborne.

MR. MORTON said that last session they were told that Osborne House, the munificent gift of His Majesty, was only open to officers in the Army. He asked why Tommy Atkins was shut out of that institution, which was a gift to the nation. It should be open to the private soldier as well as to the officer, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not in future see that all soldiers, whether officers or men of the non-commissioned ranks, should have the benefit of the gift.

SIR F. BANBURY said he understood that Osborne House was provided for cadets going into the Navy, and also as a training school for officers; there was also, of course, a convalescent home there. It was not a very large place.

MR. MORTON: Have you been there?

SIR F. BANBURY admitted that he had not been inside, but he had viewed the building from a distance. The Army and Navy had been reduced almost to vanishing point under the present Government, but if private soldiers and seamen as well as officers were allowed to go into Osborne House, the result would be the creation of an impossible state of affairs, as the building was only a small one. He had nothing to say upon the Vote except that he thought the item £758 for the gardens rather a large sum.

Sir W. EVANS-GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) thought the point raised by the hon. Member for Sutherland was somewhat captious. Although he quite sympathised with his desire that private soldiers as well as officers should be given consideration, yet the hon. Member must be well aware that there was a magnificent institution at Netley for the non-commissioned men of the Army, and there were others of a similar kind scattered about the country, both for soldiers and for sailors. He believed that until the munificent gift of Osborne House there was no institution of the kind available for officers. The salaries enjoyed by many officers were very small, and he had known of cases where officers had been practically in a position of destitution, owing to the heavy expense attendant on long illness contracted while in the service of their country.

Mr. LEA supported the appeal which had been made to throw open Osborne House to the barrack room and lower deck. He pointed out that though there might be isolated cases of destitute officers, for every one of those there were forty similar cases from the non-commissioned ranks and the lower deck. There was not sufficient accommodation at Netley. At Osborne there were large open spaces where the men returning sick from active service could be placed in marquees during the summer months, and such accommodation would be highly appreciated.

Mr. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) thought the hon. Member for St. Pancras had somewhat under-rated the accommodation at Netley. In the discussion on that institution last session it was made apparent that there were 900 beds vacant in Netley hospital, there never being more than 300 of the beds occupied. If it was the desire of the Government to accommodate soldiers and sailors of the non-commissioned ranks there was plenty of room for doing so at Netley. This munificent gift having been made to to the nation for the purpose of a convalescent home for officers as well as a training college for naval cadets, there ought to be no question as to the hygienic conditions of the buildings. Some years ago a Commission of eminent medical men inquired into those conditions, and reported very unfavourably in regard to the water supply and some of the buildings. As a rumour had been circulated that the health of the boys at Osborne had not been very good he would be glad to hear that the recommendations of the Commission had been carried out.

*Mr. HARCOURT said there appeared to have been a considerable amount of confusion in the minds of hon. Members in regard to the expenditure at Osborne. The training college for boys for the Navy was not under his Office but under the Admiralty, and all his Office was concerned with was the erection of the building. When Osborne House was taken over the drainage was found to be very bad, but the whole system had since been remodelled, and the main sewer replaced. It was now in a perfectly sanitary condition suitable for the highest requirements of a convalescent hospital. Special pains had been taken to secure a good water supply. The old wells were not being used; a special supply had been secured. As to the use of this hospital by officers only, hon. Members had apparently forgotten the conditions of the Royal gift. Undoubtedly the country received a magnificent gift, but it was made on certain terms embodied in the Osborne Estates Act of 1902. Under that Act a part of the House and the grounds were to be kept in their present state as a memorial to Her late Majesty the Queen, but the remainder was to be devoted to the purposes of a Convalescent Home for officers of the Navy and Army. That accounted for the way Osborne had been administered, and he thought its administration had been most successful. Those hon. Members who had had experience of hospitals generally would agree with him that the expenditure had not been extravagant. He felt sure that anyone who had visited the hospital and seen the patients would not begrudge the money spent upon the obvious advantages which the forces of the Crown were receiving. No less than 330 patients passed through the Home in the year 1906-7, an increase of thirty over the previous year, and eighty-eight over the year 1904-5. He reminded the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London that the expenditure covered not only the upkeep of the Convalescent Home, but also the maintenance and custody of the State Apartments and Museum and grounds, all of which were open to the public. It was a very large place to look after, and it was visited every year by some 60,000 or 70,000 persons.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.) asked for further information in regard to the £850 for "work incidental to the discontinuance of electric generating and change over to a supply from the company's mains."

*MR. HARCOURT reminded the hon. Member that that was an item in last year's Estimates. There had been a considerable fall in the maintenance expenses, amounting to £235, and that was a direct result of the change.

SIR F. BANBURY thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his reply, and said he was not aware that the grounds were open to the public. He was quite as anxious as hon. Members opposite that every facility should be given for the admission of private soldiers to convalescent homes, but it would not be possible to deal with them at Osborne House.

MR. MORTON called attention to the item of £85 for the travelling expenses of the Osborne Advisory Committee and Consulting Staff. As for the lack of facilities offered to the private soldier——

*The CHAIRMAN: The question of facilities for the private soldier is out of order. Had I known the terms of the Act of Parliament I should not have allowed the previous discussion on that point.

MR. MORTON asked for an explanation of the sum of money spent upon the Osborne Advisory Committee.

*MR. HARCOURT said the Advisory Committee consisted of very eminent surgeons who gave their services and made periodical visits to the institution to satisfy him that the Convalescent Home was being properly conducted. These surgeons examined the patients, and he thought the least the Government could do was to pay their travelling expenses seeing that they gave their services. He could not speak too highly of the valuable services which these men had given most willingly.

Vote agreed to.

3. £50,700, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular buildings.

SIR F. BANBURY called attention to an item of £11,000 for the erection of a new consulate at Cairo, and stated that the original estimate was £6,000. If a proper estimate had been made at first, why should an increase of nearly 100 per cent. have been necessary? An item of £51,600 for the acquisition of a new Embassy House at Madrid, and for alterations to the house and stables, showed an increase of £11,600 on the original estimate. That seemed to be a large amount for the house of the Ambassador at Madrid. It was not easy to know exactly what would be the final cost of a new building unless a very careful estimate was made, but in this case it was not a new building. Before the house was bought the Government should have known what they were going to pay for it. The amount of the item seemed to him to be extremely large and to require explanation.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON, referring to an item of £830 for the maintenance and repair of certain cemeteries abroad, asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied that the sum was sufficient for the careful and sympathetic maintenance of the cemeteries. From time to time complaints were made in the public Press and otherwise as to the neglect of these cemeteries. That was very painful to persons who had relatives or friends buried in these cemeteries. He thought it was discreditable to this country if the cemeteries were not properly and sympathetically looked after. He would be very glad to have some reassurance from the right hon. Gentleman on that point.

*MR. MORTON also asked an assurance from his right hon. friend that these cemeteries were being kept up in a decent and proper manner. He had received private information that at several places that was not the case. He would like to know why they were asked to vote £51,600 for a house and stables at Madrid, and £11,000 for the erection of a new consulate at Cairo. One would have thought that with the income-tax at a shilling in the pound a great many of the places mentioned in the Vote might have waited for a few years before large sums of money were spent on them. If the people of Sutherlandshire wanted money for necessary improvements they could not get a penny, but consulates abroad could get money voted by the £100,000.

*MR. HARCOURT said he heartily sympathised with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. Owing to the pressure of the war expenditure the items before the Committee were kept down to the lowest possible amount. These places had been waiting for many years, and many of them were in such a scandalous condition that they could wait no longer. No effort was being spared to effect economies, but if we were to have ambassadors abroad they must be provided with proper dwellings. As to the increase in the cost of the Cairo Consulate the item was not so unsatisfactory as it looked on the paper. The first estimate was not made on a detailed plan or specification. It was a rough, and more or less speculative, estimate made by the consul; but when a proper estimate was made it was found that more money would have to be spent. At Madrid not only had the house to be acquired, but a good deal of money had to be spent on the necessary alterations. The adaptation of the house was more expensive than was originally expected. The furniture in the house was found to be absolutely unsuitable for the purpose for which the building was purchased. In reply to the hon. Members who had called attention to the cemeteries, he had to say that there appeared to be a little confusion as to the cemeteries which were under the charge of his Department. Some of the cemeteries abroad were not under the charge of the Department at all. The cemeteries of which they had charge were at Athens, Bayonne, and on the Bosphorus; in China, Japan, Corea, and Siam; in the Ionian Islands; Cathcart's Hill, Crimea; Gallipoli; the Piraeus; and at Suakim. He had not personally received complaints in regard to any of these cemeteries, but he hoped that any hon. Members who got complaints would bring them to his notice in order that he might see that proper and reverent attention was paid to them.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) asked whether in estimating the cost of the new consulate at Stanleyville at £4,000 the fact that labour was cheap had been taken into consideration. In the Vote there was a small item for the new house for the assistant Japanese secretary at Tokio, and he would like to know from the right hon. Gentleman if the amount put on the Estimates for the buildings represented the real money spent on them. The policy of the Government in regard to the provision of good consulate houses was one which ought to commend itself to both Parties in the House. There was an item for a new Legation House at Adis Abeba, in Abysinnia, and he could not see that that could be objected to. It might be advocated that rough and ready houses ought to be sufficient for our consuls in these days of economy, but wherever the representatives of Germany and France went they attempted to impress the natives with the importance of their position and of the countries they represented. All over the world he found that Germany especially, and France, but not the United States, who were in European rivalry for prestige amongst semi-civilised or semi-savage countries, spent money lavishly so as to impress the natives. He, therefore, believed that the policy of the Government was wise, and if the right hon. Gentleman came down next year requesting £5,000 or £10,000 for Consulates in the Congo Free State he would support him. Our Ministers and Consuls abroad, especially in semi-savage tropical countries, ought to be provided with the very best accommodation possible—for that at the best was very poor comfort for their exile.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said that there was an item of £5,000 for the erection of a new Legation House at Adis Abeba. Why was it called a Legation? He understood that our representative was only of the rank of a Consulate-General. The hon. Member for Gravesend had said that our representatives were never so well housed as the Ministers of Germany and France.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said that he had not stated that our Ministers were badly housed, but that they were often not so well housed as those of Germany and France.

*MR. REES said he agreed that the nations named made much of their representatives, but at Teheran no one was housed like our own Minister. He presumed that the new premises in the estimates were erected in the Legation Compound, and it was hardly conceivable that £5,000 should have been spent on additions to the small garden house at Gulahek. In regard to Persia, it was not said in the Estimates what India contributed towards the very handsome palace at Teheran. He would like to know how much was paid by the Indian Government towards the upkeep of that luxurious palace and how much India contributed towards the building expenses.

SIR F. BANBURY said that the First Commissioner of Works had deplored the increase in the expenditure on the buildings at Cairo and Madrid, but that the Estimate had not been made on specification, and therefore could not be relied on. In regard to Madrid, it was said that after the house had been bought it was found that the alterations necessary to make it suitable for an Embassy were much greater than was originally expected; but he did not think that the answer of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the new Consulate at Cairo was satisfactory. What he wanted to know was who was responsible for the Estimates, and for the supervision of the works? Who was responsible for proper contracts being obtained and for seeing that the works were carried out in a proper manner? It would almost appear as if the repairs to, and the erection of, Embassies and Consulates abroad were carried on in a haphazard manner, and without proper supervision. The right hon. Gentleman might say that those buildings were being carried on all over the face of the globe, and that it would be impossible—certainly very expensive—to have a permanent staff to supervise them. He did not know what happened in Persia, but he knew Cairo and Madrid; and it seemed to him that it might have been possible to obtain native professional talent to supervise the works at those places which involved an expenditure of such a large amount of money. That raised the point as to whether under these circumstances it would not be better to hire houses for British Embassies and Consulates instead of buying them.

MR. REES: The houses do not exist in most cases.

SIR F. BANBURY said they did exist in Madrid and Cairo. He had already stated that he did not know anything about Persia; but surely in all European countries it would be easy to hire a building, and he was perfectly right in saying that even now a very large number of houses for Consulates were hired and not purchased. He noticed that Japan was the only instance in which the estimates for construction and addition had been adhered to. He further called attention to the fact that the large sum of £47,000 was put down under the head of "minor works" for the "acquisition of sites and buildings and works in connection therewith." Of that sum the Vote required for 1907–8 was £20,000. They had had no statement of what that meant, and he hoped they would have one from the First Commissioner of Works.

*MR. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness Burghs) trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not listen to the seductive suggestion of the hon. Baronet that he should hire these buildings instead of acquiring them. As anyone who had any knowledge of the matter knew, it was infinitely better in the long run for this country to buy than to hire. In other countries the interest on money borrowed for building purposes was very high, not less than 8 to 10 per cent., whereas in this country it would be 2½ to 3 per cent. It was, therefore, infinitely better for the Government of this country to build or buy a house in St. Petersburg, for instance, than to hire it.

SIR F. BANBURY inquired what would happen in the case of a revolution?

*MR. ANNAN BRYCE said that Russia was a civilised country, and he supposed that the Government could insure there as well as here. He also called attention to three Votes for the erection of Vice-Consulate buildings in Siam. One was at Chiengmai, a very important place with a Consul of high standing in the Civil Service living there. There were a great number of British subjects, and a judge who was a member of a mixed court. The total estimate for these buildings was, however, only £350. At Laken the total estimate was £650, the probable expenditure till 31st March, 1907, being £300, and the Vote required for 1907–8 £350. At Phré again, the original total estimate was £650; the Vote required for 1907–8 was £350, and the further amount required for completing the service was £300. None of the sums to be spent upon these establishments could possibly be adequate for the proper accommodation of His Majesty's servants in the places mentioned. He asked, therefore, whether they were the total amounts which it was proposed to spend.

SIR GILBERT PARKER thought the Committee were entitled to some further explanation as to the new Consulate at Cairo, and as to the expenditure to which the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London had called attention. The original Estimate was £6,000, but the revised total was £11,000, a difference of £5,000. He asked whether the increase was due to the acquisition of land after the Estimate was framed, because the cost of land had gone up tremendously in Cairo during the last five years, and prices had become very inflated. All these differences showed a lack of sufficient care in framing the Estimates, and at any rate, a little light on the subject would be useful. His hon. friend the Member for the City of London had raised important questions as to the acquisition of a number of sites and buildings and works in connection therewith, involving the expenditure of a very large sum indeed, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them details in regard to those sites and buildings. The amount was put down at the bottom of the list, and no doubt it was deemed insignificant, but £47,000 was a very large sum indeed, and he thought they were justified in asking for a full statement with regard to it. Then there was a sum for allowances to certain Ministers. What Ministers? No one wanted to deprive any Ministers, insufficiently paid as they were, of any allowances which might be required, but he thought some explanation was necessary. The allowances seemed to be traditional, and were allotted in addition to the Minister's usual salary. The Estimates were very useful, as they gave them a clear knowledge of what was going on in Government Departments, and he thought they were fully justified in spending some time in debating them, as by that means they brought out what otherwise would not be made clear. Of course, the First Commissioner wished to get his Votes as soon as possible, but he urged his hon. friends not to be deterred from pressing the right hon. Gentleman by any idea that they might be erroneously described as obstructionists.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) desired to know the method that was adopted to arrive at the improvements that were necessary in the different buildings. Who decided that extra accommodation was necessary? By what method was it decided where was the best site? Was the selection made by some officer of the Consulate or by some special officer sent out from this country? He would also like to know who drew the plans of the buildings to be erected, and whether the plans were submitted to the Office of Works and investigated to see that the Estimates approached accuracy. He thought the Committee would have more confidence in the Estimates if they knew the method employed by the Office of Works in preparing and checking them.

*MR. REES asked, in connection with the Vote for radiators installed at St. Petersburg, whether the building occupied by the Embassy had now become the property of the nation. When he lived at Petersburg the British Ambassador occupied a portion of the Soltikoff Palace, but as money was being spent by the State on this portion of a private house, perhaps the Government had since purchased the front upon the Palace quay? If the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London knew many of these places for which provision was made in the list under consideration he would not, he was sure, suggest that buildings should be hired. Having a good deal of knowledge of many of these houses he could only say that they were not in any way beyond the necessities of the case. It was only in the case of Teheran that our representative was housed in a conspicuously suitable manner. Probably that was because India contributed to the cost. He did not believe that further knowledge of these places would lead to the belief that more money than was necessary was being spent upon them.

Mr. HARCOURT, replying to the hon. Member for Stoke, said that the method of deciding upon the sites required for these buildings was, in the first place, by means of communications by letter between the people on the spot and his office. Therefore, they had before them, often for many years, knowledge of the sites which were available, and those which were suitable. When that preliminary had been decided the plans were drawn in his office, and bills of quantities were prepared. The Estimates were made before he was able to make a contract, as he could not put out a request for tenders and accept a contract until he had Parliamentary authority. Before that, however, he had to hand into the Treasury a rough estimate of what he thought was necessary. The hon. Baronet had talked about the contracts of private individuals and firms, but very often in those cases the estimates were largely exceeded. In every case the Government had their own clerk of the works in charge of the building, and in most cases they had the benefit of the services of an architect, generally one of their own staff, during the course of construction. He thought that every precaution was taken in the matter, but of course the Committee would realise that it was more difficult to build at such a distance than at home. In many foreign countries local contractors would not give them a firm contract for a lump sum, but they were perfectly willing to work on schedule prices, and therefore the Department had to proceed very carefully in framing the schedule. He agreed that the amount put down on the Estimate for the expenditure at Chiengrai was insufficient, but the total amount was £750, and the balance came from Indian sources. Exception had been taken by the junior Member for the City to the item for the acquisition of sites and buildings in different parts of the world. He did not expect that that item would escape the vigilance of the hon. Baronet, and he had rather hoped he would be asked about it. The concealment it implied was quite intentional. It was necessary for the Government to purchase sites in different parts of the world, and if he were to indicate the places where the Government proposed to purchase the price of the land would be raised against him. Therefore he was compelled to ask the Committee to trust him to that extent. The hon. Baronet had also referred to an item for the maintenance and repairs of buildings, expressing the opinion that the amount was large. He would point out to the hon. Gentleman that the number of buildings which we had to maintain and repair in various parts of the world was also very large. The hon. Member had drawn attention to the fact that that item included not only structural repairs but also new works. The new works under this head were extremely few; they were very small and absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the buildings. He himself was responsible for most of the contracts. Of course before a contract was entered into rough estimates had to be obtained, and other persons might be asked to supply those estimates; but the contracts were all drawn up by the Government architect. He did not agree with the hon. Baronet that the Government would do well to hire houses in these places instead of purchasing them. It was in his opinion most desirable that this country should own its own embassies and houses of that kind. The saving by purchase as against hire was enormous. In many of these places there was no house which could be hired suitable for an embassy. Private houses had no chancellories attached to them. It was much more dignified and economic to own houses for diplomatic purposes. Referring to the questions of the Member for Montgomery Boroughs, our representative at Adis Abeba was now a Minister, the extra buildings at Teheran were at Gulahek, and the embassy at Petersburg was still a private building, though that was no reason why we should freeze our Ambassador. Perhaps the radiators were capable of removal if required.

Sir W. EVANS GORDON thought the right hon. Gentleman, when he replied with regard to the upkeep of the cemeteries in South Africa, did not quite appreciate the point which had been put. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if complaints were received with regard to the upkeep of those cemeteries he would be glad to inquire into the matter. What he really desired to ask was whether the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied that the sum of £830 was sufficient for the purpose for which it was allotted, and whether it was properly distributed. He hoped the First Commissioner would satisfy himself that the persons who were carrying out the work in the different parts were proper people for the work, and the wages they received were adequate. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that in the case of buildings for diplomatic purposes purchase was by far more economical than hiring.

SIR F. BANBURY said the Estimates for building these large houses in different parts seemed to have been exceeded in every case before them, and all he had said was that it might possibly be wise to consider the question of hiring houses as well as the question of building them.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON: The hon. Baronet went somewhat further than that.

SIR F. BANBURY said it had not been his intention to do so. The hon. Member opposite had alluded to St. Petersburg, but there, the right hon. Gentleman said, the house was hired.

*MR. ANNAN BRYCE: And in other places as well as in St. Petersburg.

SIR. F. BANBURY said it was really a matter of business. If they could buy more cheaply let them buy; if it was cheaper to hire let them hire. He was concerned for economy. He did not care about dignity. There were a great many places abroad which at very little expense could be adapted to their purposes. There were many old palaces which belonged to the ancient nobility in different cities of Europe. They would not part with them under any circumstances, but not being able to live in them, they would be only too glad if some one would occupy them and keep them in repair.

*MR. MORTON said the complaint about exceeding the Estimates was a very old one, and it certainly was an extraordinary way of conducting business. Any private firm managing its business in that way could not long keep out of the Bankruptcy Court. He would mention only one or two items. The cost of the Cairo buildings, up to date, exceeded by about 90 per cent. what the Committee were led to expect when the undertaking was entered upon. In the case of the building at Amoy the Estimate was exceeded by 50 per cent. It was hardly fair that the Government should ask the Committee for money if they did not keep nearer to the Estimates. He was not blaming the right hon. Gentleman, who was not responsible for these Estimates. It was the previous Government which had got them into this trouble. He knew, also, that they could not expect Estimates to be absolutely adhered to, but he thought they ought to keep within 10 per cent. of them. He asked what was the meaning of the item of £5,000 for the reconstruction of the Chancery at Paris. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that it was not intended to keep up all the cemeteries in South Africa, and he would be glad to know the names of those which it was intended to keep in order. He was bound to say that, whatever number of cemeteries there were in South Africa or elsewhere for the interment of our soldiers and sailors, they ought to be kept up by this country. If the right hon. Gentleman would state what cemeteries he intended to keep up in South Africa, it might render it unnecessary for anyone to make complaints, because certain of the cemeteries would not be under the control of the Government at all. He thought it was always right, when they had the opportunity, to criticise the Estimates, because it was so easy to spend other people's money. It was remarkably easy to call upon them to give £6,000 for a public building, and then to come down upon them afterwards and say "we want £11,000." He would like to see public business carried on at least as carefully as private business.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) in regard to the building at Cairo, the Estimate for which, he said, had been nearly doubled, pointed out that the value of land at Cairo was very much inflated at the present time. Recently land had been sold in Cairo at a price per foot greater than had ever been paid in London, except in the City. The Committee would agree that such a price was not likely to be continued for any length of time. Therefore, would it not be possible, even at this late hour, to wait until the price of land had fallen? In that way a certain amount of money would probably be saved, and he did not suppose the Consular Service would be very much hurt.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth) agreed with the hon. Member for Gravesend as to the erection of Consular buildings in the Congo Free State, on which they were going to spend £8,000. He suggested that the buildings should be constructed of strong and substantial material, because it was not unlikely that they might be used as places of refuge. He wished to make an inquiry as to the Consular building at Dakar, on which it was proposed to spend £7,476. They were putting up one at Monrovia; not very far off, which was to cost £3,500. Dakar was a place, he believed, where a certain number of ships were signalled; it was a French port, and he did not think there was much English shipping there, at any rate. He desired to know what reason there was for a Consular building of the magnitude proposed. Reference had been made to the expenditure of £5,000 on the Chancery of the Paris Embassy. It had cost an enormous sum of money in the past, and was one of our finest buildings. He did not know what the reason was for the reconstruction of the Chancery, but he confessed the item surprised him, because the Paris Embassy was one which most of them had seen and admired, and was considered the most complete under the British flag.

*MR. HARCOURT said he quite agreed as to the Embassy at Paris being one of the finest in the world, but the Chancery was thoroughly unsuitable for the work which was done there, and it was essential, where so much work had to be carried out, and where the pressure was so great, that accommodation should be provided in order to enable its being conducted under proper and business-like conditions. The hon. Member for Blackpool had asked about the Consular building at Cairo, and had spoken rather as if the Government were going into the market to buy land. He was aware that the price of land was high, but in this case the site was already bought, and it would be most wasteful to keep it vacant and not to put up a Consular building which would meet all requirements. The hon. Member for Sutherland had asked a question with regard to the excess on the estimate for the building at Amoy. It had been necessary to reconstruct a portion of the building, as part of the woodwork had been destroyed by white ants.

Vote agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £427,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1908, for the Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, and Post Office Telegraph Buildings in Great Britain, and certain Post Offices abroad, including Furniture, Fuel, and sundry Miscellaneous Services."

SIR F. BANBURY said he was sorry to see that in connection with this Vote there was an increase in every item but two. The Vote was for a large sum and it was very strange that a Government pledged to economy should find it necessary to increase every item but two. The original Estimates had been very much exceeded, and although there might be considerable force in what the right hon. Gentleman had said about it being extremely difficult to supervise works carried out in foreign countries, that argument did not apply to works in this country. For example, at Sunderland the original estimate for a Customs Building was £1,500, whilst the revised estimate was £2,150, or an increase of £650. That was a very large increase on such a small amount. At Southampton £6,950 was required for the erection of new Inland Revenue offices under the original estimate, but the revised total estimate was £8,450. For the Blackfriars new power station for the General Post Office the original total estimate was £40,000, and the revised estimate £48,500; and for Post Office buildings at Hull the original estimate was £40,000 and the revised estimate £58,000. He noticed that in the case of the Gloucester (George St.) Branch P.O. extension the original estimate was £51,800 and the revised estimate £5,920.

*MR. HARCOURT: That is a misprint. There is a cipher too many, and the amount should be £5,180.

SIR F. BANBURY said that at Newport the orginal estimate for a new Post Office was £24,850, whilst the revised estimate was £31,000. In almost every case the estimates were nothing like accurate. Post Office buildings were simple business buildings, and it ought to be perfectly easy to obtain reasonably accurate estimates for them. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them some assurance that in the future greater care would be exercised in the preparation of Estimates. He invited hon. Members opposite who were pledged to economy to support him in his desire to have these works carried out in a business-like manner. He would moved to reduce the Vote by £100.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £426,900, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir Frederick Banbury.)

*MR. HARCOURT explained that the original estimates were only provisional and approximate, and it was not until Parliamentary authority was obtained that they prepared the detailed specification on which the contract was made. They arrived at the best estimate they could, but they were obliged to make a speculative estimate. The Blackfriars power station was to provide an electric supply for the Central Post Office. For the Post Office buildings at Hull the original estimate was only a provisional one. In the case of Sunderland it was simply a readjustment of several offices under the same roof.

MR. ASHLEY called attention to an item of £1,000 for the new post office at Blackpool. That work had been a long time overdue. In the season he himself had had the greatest difficulty in getting attended to, not on account of the staff, but because the accommodation was inadequate. He impressed on the right hon. Gentleman that, if he was only going to spend £1,000 in the current financial year, he ought to give a promise of a considerably larger amount next year.

MR. WARD pointed out that the building programme of post offices and other public buildings had been considerably delayed owing largely to the scarcity of money caused by the war. There was at present in nearly all Departments enormous arrears in building operations. Many of the office buildings were in nothing like the condition necessary for effective and efficient work. He had seen defective and inadequate buildings all over the country. There was room for very considerable improvement all round. The House of Commons voted millions of pounds for works of destruction without criticism, and if it was proposed to throw money away on useless objects it was always possible to get support for such expenditure. But when it came to the question of building or increasing the wealth of the nation by public works, any amount of pettifogging criticism was made about little details not worth considering. As a matter of fact he thought that the building programme of the Government was especially disappointing considering how good the present time was for such work. The building trade was depressed all over the country. Thousands of workmen were out of employment. Contractors found themselves without work to do. Now, therefore, was the time when the Government ought to try to make up leeway for the omissions of the last ten years and for circumstances over which the present Administration had no control. He was quite sure that the Committee would be very pleased to vote money for works of public utility—considerably larger sums than those specified in the Vote—if they were satisfied that the works were required. In his opinion, considering the position of the building trade and the amount of unemployment, the criticism directed against the First Commissioner of Works should have been not that the Vote was too large, but in the direction of trying to induce him to increase the expenditure. He would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee what he proposed to do next year to make up the leeway which undoubtedly existed in the building programme of Government Departments.

If the statement were not satisfactory he would be inclined as a protest to support the Motion for reduction.

MR. C. E. PRICE said post office extension in Edinburgh was a matter which needed to be dealt with. He urged that the work should be pressed forward for the simple reason that there were at the present moment a large number of men connected with the building trade unemployed in that city. He would have been better pleased if the Vote for this year had been larger in amount. By pressing on the work with all speed great relief would be given to the tradesmen.

*MR. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) said that a few weeks ago a correspondence was placed in his hands which had taken place between a certain authority in his own constituency and the Board of Works. It had been suggested by hon. Gentlemen opposite that there was carelessness in drawing up the Estimates, but that correspondence showed that, so far from that being the case, the right hon. Gentleman and the members of his Staff gave great attention to the details of the Estimates, and if he had been attending to his own business, he could not have exercised greater economy, or taken greater interest in the matter than he did. He thought it was only fair that that should be stated.

* MR. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire) called attention to an item for the post office at Dumbarton, and asked how that matter stood. It had been under consideration for some time. About a year ago the Post Office had in contemplation a site which would not have met with the approval of the people of the burgh. It was considered that that site would prove inconvenient, and that it was not in the direction towards which the burgh was extending. He would like to be informed whether that site had been selected, or whether a new site had been settled upon. If they looked through the list of proposed works in this Vote, it would be seen that the allowance to Scotland was by no means so large as it ought to be, and that seemed to him a reason for generous treatment as regarded post office accommodation at Dumbarton.

SIR F. BANBURY said that hon. Gentlemen below the gangway seemed to have the war on the brain. It was said that owing to the war building work was in arrear. It would be out of order to enter into discussion with the hon. Member for Stoke upon the question of spending money for destructive purposes, but he might say that he and his friends, being anxious that peace should be preserved, thought that the best way of providing for peace was to have a strong Navy. He had never questioned the right of the First Commissioner to provide the proposed new works. What he criticised was the bringing forward of an Estimate of £40,000, and then a revised Estimate of £58,000 for the same work. He always understood that the hon. Member for Stoke was an apostle of economy. It was not economy to spend £58,000 if they could get the same work done for £40,000. He disagreed with the First Commissioner when he said that it was difficult to get an accurate estimate. The building of a post office was not a new thing, and it should be perfectly easy for an architect to make a proper estimate. Hon. Members below the gangway did not seem to grasp a fundamental principle in the governing of a great country. If they wished to manage a great country, or a great business, economically, they must look into all the items. It was in small items that extravagance occurred. It was necessary that the heads of the great departments should bear in mind that their Estimates would be freely criticised in the Committee. He did not blame the officials; they were not dealing with their own money, and unless there was criticism they might be tempted to save themselves trouble by putting on a little extra cost. He was not satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the increase of this item. He could not conceive that there should be any great difficulty in arriving at a fairly accurate estimate. Probably the estimate was correct, but the contract was excessive. He expressed the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would not be led away by the airy sentiment of the hon. Member for Stoke. Hon. Members were there to see that the nation got a sovereign's worth for a sovereign; and they had no right to spend 25s. in getting a sovereign's worth.

* Mr. HARCOURT said that the hon. Member for the City of London had apparently not considered how great was the variation in the sites and requirements of the post offices in different towns all over the country. The hon. Member seemed to think that post offices were cut out to one pattern, as if they were so many Noah's arks in a toy shop. The hon. Member for Dumbarton had spoken of the site of the post office of that town. He was quite aware that that matter had not been settled, but he hoped that it would be soon. The hon. Member for the City of London said that they had got "war on the brain"; but he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Stoke as to the financial effects of the war. The Office of Works was rather the Cinderella of the Departments, and when there was that great and, in his opinion, unnecessary expenditure on war, his office suffered most by having all its Estimates cut down, so that building fell into arrear. He had added £30,000 to the building Vote this year, and it was because he was making up those arrears of buildings that he was attacked by hon. Members opposite. To the hon. Member for Stoke he would say that he had taken as much as he could for building, and that he must spread his zeal for building over the years he might be allowed to control it. At any rate, he had no desire to limit the occupation which would be afforded to workmen in the erection of these buildings. The hon. Member for Blackpool was not such a rigid economist as his neighbour the hon. Member for the City of London, and he had complained that the Office of Works had been too modest in beginning a post office suitable for the correspondence which no doubt took place between the hon. Member and that town. He had provided the usual sum for the foundations of the new post office at Blackpool, and when these were laid the building would proceed more rapidly. It might be some consolation to the hon. Member, at least, that they had got a Government in office which had paid attention to the demands of Blackpool, and had not neglected them in a manner which, according to the hon. Member, had been the custom of the previous Government.

Sir W. EVANS GORDON asked the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention had been called to the post office building situated opposite the new Victoria and Albert Museum buildings. He was glad to think that that post office was to be enlarged, but he desired to call attention to the deplorable condition of the site, which adjoined an old wooden shanty that might be a positive danger to the post office building. He asked whether the £1,200 on the Estimates for the enlargement of the post office there was sufficient to secure the erection of a suitable building for that neighbourhood?

Mr. ASHLEY said he had asked the right hon. Gentleman how long it would be before the new post office at Blackpool would be completed. It was estimated to cost £15,000, but there was only £1,000 this year on the Estimates for it. He did not think that his constituents would be so grateful to the Government as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. They asked for bread and he gave them a stone. At the present rate it would take fifteen years to get the post office completed.

*Mr. HARCOURT said that the hon. Member evidently did not understand building operations. A post office took about two years to build, and he hoped to complete the Blackpool post office in about eighteen months, after the completion of the foundations, although he could give no pledge as to the exact time it would take. As to the remark of the hon. Member for Stepney in regard to the branch post office opposite the Victoria and Albert Museum, he believed that the building would be suitable.

*Mr. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) objected to the reply which the right hon. Gentleman had given to the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London in regard to the extraordinary excess of expenditure over the estimate in connection with the post office at Hull. The state of things entirely warranted everything the hon. Baronet had said of it, and the explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had given did not meet the case at all. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London evidently fancied that post offices could be turned out en bloc or punched out in any quantity; but there was no question of comic opera about the supply of post offices, and his hon. friend was entitled to a serious reply. He, however, got nothing from the right hon. Gentleman but a reflection upon his ideas of building. They all knew that, given a certain state of things and certain requirements, it ought easily to be within the capacity of the right hon. Gentleman so to arrange his estimate that it was much nearer the actual cost than was represented by fifty-eight as comparedwith forty. There must have been some very gross error in the quantities, and he thought the Committee were entitled to learn how the error arose before they voted this large sum of money, which was altogether disproportionate to the services rendered. If a certain site was selected for a post office there ought to be no difficulty about the matter, because it was perfectly well known what the requirements were, having regard to the number of letters, telegrams, parcels and newspapers to be dealt with. There was no difficulty at all in arriving at an accurate estimate, but instead of that they had, as in the case of Hull, a vast expenditure over the estimate. The hon. Member for Stoke had said that the building trade was in a depressed condition, but they would like to have some information on that point. He did not think it was in a depressed condition in many parts of the country. In the last week he had wanted a dozen men for building purposes within twenty miles of the House, and had been unable to get them, and he was not sure that the same condition of things did not prevail in other parts of the country. He therefore thought the hon. Member for Stoke was exaggerating, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them some well-thought-out answer on the subject, such as would satisfy reasonable persons. So far, however, up to the present, from the inquiry of the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London having received the consideration which it deserved, they had been treated in a light, although kindly and genial manner, and had been given no information at all.

*Mr. HARCOURT regretted that the hon. Member was dissatisfied with his reply, because he thought he had clearly pointed out that in the case of Hull several difficulties had arisen in regard to the foundations. Everybody who had had to do with building knew that in certain cases unexpected difficulties as to foundations occurred when the excavations for that purpose were made. He might point out, moreover, that the Hull estimates were made under the old bad system of rough estimates before taking a Vote of the House. He was so much impressed with the badness of that method that about twelve months ago he gave orders that the estimates should be made much closer than they had been before.

Mr. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate) associated himself with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Stoke that in times when the building trade was depressed, there should be as far as possible increase of expenditure upon public works.

Question put.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £313,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, in respect of sundry Public Buildings in Great Britain, not provided for on other Votes."

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS asked for a statement as to the erection of official residences for the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Senior Naval Lord in lieu of existing residences. This item in the Estimates, he understood, referred to the building now being erected at the end of the new processional avenue—or rather, the continuation of the old Mall. He desired an assurance that the work would be proceeded with upon the plan approved by the late Government, although the amount asked for the year was small. He was certain that such a building was the only proper termination to the avenue, because the alignment of the Mall was at an unfortunate angle at Charing Cross, and therefore the only proper way of terminating the avenue was to have a building of the kind proposed facing Buckingham Palace in the way suggested. He also desired some explanation in reference to the £5,000 on account for extension of the National Gallery over part of the barracks site. The total estimated cost was not ascertained, but it would be remembered that the removal of the old St. George's Barracks had often been discussed, as it was generally considered they were a source of danger from fire to the national collection. He supposed that it would not be possible to remove the whole of the buildings, but he hoped that the removal would include the dangerous part. Another item of interest was £1,500 for the casting and erection of the statue, "Physical Energy," by the late Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., the model of which was lent to the nation. He would be glad to know how the work of casting was proceeding, whether it was likely to be finished in the present year, and what site had been selected for its erection. He observed that an amount of £5,000 was set down for a new Stationery Office warehouse, but the total cost had not been ascertained. Why was that? Where was the warehouse to be erected? He hoped the mistake would not be made of taking expensive land in the neighbourhood of the Stationery Office, for there was no necessity for that in these days of telephonic communication. He noticed that a beginning had been made with the arch which was to connect the new with the old buildings for the Local Government Board. That means of communication met with general approval when the designs were exhibited, and it was felt that the arch would do much to hide the difference in the street alignment. He was glad to find there was no truth in the rumour that the arch was to be abandoned.

*MR. HARCOURT said in reference to the new wing of the Admiralty which the right hon. Gentleman had described as at the end of the processional avenue—a word he hoped would never be adopted as describing the new thoroughfare——

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he had no intention of so describing it.

*MR. HARCOURT hoped it would always retain the old, the historic name, "The Mall." The foundations of the new buildings were finished, and the superstructure was now rising in accordance with the original plans. He was pleased to get the Vote for the National Gallery upon the Estimates in the present year, for it marked an advance in a policy the Board of Works had in the past been very anxious to follow. The National Gallery would be much safer, and there would be space to extend it westwards for the reception of many art additions. The Vote would pledge the Government to the removal of part of the barracks, now a source of danger and a disfigurement upon a space that would be available for extension of the Gallery. He had himself a plan for the removal of the recruiting depot also, but for reasons the right hon. Gentleman would appreciate he would not go into that. The casting in bronze of the statue "Physical Energy," by the late Mr. Watts, had taken longer than had been anticipated, but it was being proceeded with. He wished to explain that a sort of implied promise he made last year that the statue should be erected on the bridge at the end of the Serpentine could not possibly be carried out. He had some doubt as to the scale of the statue, as compared with the bidge, and had had drawings made to scale and shown on the bridge. They were ludicrously out of proportion, and after consulting Lord Plymouth and others it was obvious that the statue could not be placed there, apart from the heavy structural and engineering expenditure involved. On further consideration he thought he would be able to find a very good site where the statue would have a dignified and appropriate position, somewhere in the broad avenue from the Serpentine to the Round Pond, Kensington Gardens. He had not been able to give the full estimate for the Stationery Office warehouse, but he wished again to say that, in pursuance of a policy similar to that applied to the National Gallery, the warehouse would not be placed, as was originally intended, at the back of the Tate Gallery. The land there would be left for the possible extension of the Tate Gallery, and the warehouse would be erected in Elverton Street, Westminster. As to the arch over Charles Street, though there was a rumour that a wicked Radical Government and an unappreciative First Commissioner had decided to knock out that portion of the design, there was no truth in the rumour. The original design would be carried out, except that in the statuary some few details had been altered after consultation with the architect. There would be no departure from the original design.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on his extremely satisfactory statement, especially with regard to the National Gallery. In reference to the statue by the late Mr. G. F. Watts, it had always struck him that the site proposed for it was unsuitable, and that it would be entirely out of proportion to the place. He was glad, therefore, that the matter had been left over for a time, though he did not commit himself to approval of the suggestion which the right hon. Gentleman was considering as to a site in the Broad Walk. He was quite certain that the proportions of the statue in relation to the original site would have been entirely wrong, and the work would have been anything but an improvement there. With regard to the arch over Charles Street, the right hon. Gentleman's answer was again satisfactory. He understood that while they were going to carry out the arch they proposed to modify the idea of the statuary above it. He was certainly satisfied with the information which the right hon. Gentleman had given, because he thought it was quite possible that, on reconsideration, some modification would be found to be desirable.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) called attention to the charges for insurance on buildings, his object being to ascertain why these amounts were spent at all, in which offices the insurances were effected, and what properties. Another general subject to which he wished to call attention had reference to the matter of furniture. A sum of over £9,000 was taken for furniture. Was there any arrangement in the Office of Works by which it was ensured that all the furniture purchased was made in England, and that the work was fairly allocated to different parts of the country. With regard to the items of brushes, brooms, glass, china, etc., he asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could assure the Committee that in no case would prison-made goods be purchased for the public departments. He also asked whether, in the arrangements which were made, every possible encouragement was given to those industries which produced glass and china goods. Might he also ask for information as to the astounding figure of £80,000 to be spent on the private official residences of the First Lord of the Admiralty and of the First Sea Lord? Why was that large sum of money to be spent on buying two houses for two officials—especially when they had regard to the fact that not a shilling had to be spent on a site, because the site was adjoining the Admiralty building? On page 19, there was an item of £28,000 for a vaccine station at Hendon, about which he desired some information. Further down a sum of £3,000 was taken for the sanitary improvement of public offices. Could the right hon. Gentleman explain the main items of that expenditure—an expenditure which he was sure the Committee would not grudge if the public offices were brought to the highest state of efficiency? Then a sum of £1,590 was to be spent on the Orange Street water works to supply water for the Royal palaces. What was the reason for that very large expenditure? Did the next item of £1,150 also apply to the water works, or did it apply to other heads of expenditure? In conclusion he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on having increased by nearly £4,000 the sum for the maintenance and protection of ancient monuments in Great Britain.

Mr. C. E. PRICE congratulated the First Commissioner of Works on what was being done in connection with the Law Courts in Edinburgh. That was a subject which had been under the consideration of the Government for many years, and it might be interesting to the right hon. Gentleman to know that so far back as 1885 his father visited the Law Courts in Edinburgh, and, having considered their position, was satisfied that it was necessary to make some alterations, and, he understood, agreed to see those alterations carried out. Unfortunately a change of Government came about, with the result that the intention was not fulfilled. Five or six years ago a committee was appointed by the late Government to report on the matter, and then it was recommended that considerable alterations should be made. Four new Law Courts were recommended, and he was sorry that the recommendation had not been carried out. At the same time they were very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the trouble he had taken in the matter. Though the larger scheme was not to be carried out, yet the two Law Courts proposed to be built for the better accommodation of the public would be a very great boon indeed. Another item to which he would like to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention was rent and insurance, etc., in Scotland. In Edinburgh there was a large number of public offices scattered all over the city. These were rented from different persons for Government offices. Each of these places had its attendants, and public business was carried on at present with very great inconvenience. To bring these offices under one roof would effect economies in many ways, and would constitute a reform which he was sure would be greatly appreciated. He had specially risen, however, to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the great trouble he had taken in visiting Edinburgh last summer. While others were away enjoying themselves on their holidays, the right hon. Gentleman was visiting the Law Courts and informing himself about a question which had been so long under consideration.

*Mr. MORTON said he quite agreed with his hon. friend about the Law Courts in Edinburgh. He was afraid, however, that the right hon. Gentleman had not provided enough money for them, but he hoped that the amount would be made up in next year's Estimates. He, too, would like to know something about the £80,000 to be spent on official residences for the First Lord of the Admiralty and the First Sea Lord. It seemed to him to be extravagant to spend so much money on official residences. Not only were they pledged to economy, but they must carry out that policy in a practical manner. In reference to the protection of ancient monuments, the right hon. Gentleman told them a little while ago that the works at Stirling in the King's Park and the King's Knot were included in this Vote. He would like to know what had been finally settled with regard to that matter, and whether it would now be under the right hon. Gentleman's charge and be maintained and kept up for the public use for all time. He did not wish to prevent the Committee from getting on with its work, but he would point out that while they spent money in the extravagant way suggested by this Vote, they could not find money for things that which were wanted, and, in all this expenditure there was not one solitary shilling provided for Sutherlandshire.

Sir F. BANBURY said he joined with the hon. Gentleman opposite in protesting against the expenditure of £80,000 on two official residences, in which sum the price of the land was not included. They could almost build a palace for the amount asked for. For £40,000 they could build a house with thirty or forty bedrooms—quite a palatial dwelling. It was quite unnecessary. He did not agree with the hon. Gentleman that this money might be saved and spent in other directions; he thought the money could be saved altogether. It seemed to him that two houses could be built for £15,000 or £20,000—houses as good as any ordinary person would want to live in. It would be ludicrous to spend £80,000, in addition to the value of the land. A sum of £91,495 was put down for the maintenance and repair of public offices, an increase of £8,000 on the Vote for last year. He would like to know why that increase was so large. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the expenditure of £80,000 on two official residences, as up to the present only £13,000 had been spent upon them.

*Mr. HARCOURT said the hon. Baronet did not seem to be aware that the plan for these houses, which he thought so costly, was the plan of the late Government.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: Did the First Commissioner vote against that plan?

*MR. HARCOURT: Certainly not, but this plan was in operation when he took office. These were the buildings which were to end the Mall and formed the plan which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Augustine's had pressed so much on his attention as one which would finish off in a fitting way the Memorial to the late Queen Victoria. That the buildings were going to be occupied by two officials was of no importance, because those officials already occupied houses. The house of the Senior Naval Lord in Queen Anne's gate would be disposed of, and the First Lord would be transferred and his present house would be available for the extension of public offices. These two residences were being put into an ornamental building which was part of the plan for the Queen Victoria Memorial. The reason for the increase in the expense of maintaining public buildings was that they were taking over new buildings and had to pay for the dilapidations in houses given up owing to the transfer of the War Office. One item was £1,500 for securing the safety of the Rubens' ceiling in the Whitehall Banqueting-hall. There were also a number of chimney stacks on public buildings in Whitehall in a dangerous state, and he had had to ask for £1,000 in respect of them. There was also an additional £1,200 for the maintenance of the new War Office. The hon. Member for Hoxton was of a very inquiring turn of mind. He wanted to know a number of things, some of which were obvious, and some of which, as Lord Dundreary said, no fellow could understand. The hon. Gentleman asked why the cost of insurance was included in rents. One reason was that they had had to take over some buildings on short leases in which there was a covenant to insure, and they had to insure in order not to violate that covenant.

MR. CLAUDE HAY asked what was the amount of money spent on insurance. Was it large or small?

*MR. HARCOURT said he could not say, but he should think it would be a small sum. As to the purchase of furniture, so long as he was in his present office he would certainly not allot the making of furniture to any particular district. He must go where he could get what was best at the least cost.

MR. CLAUDE HAY asked if the right hon. Gentleman could state the amount spent upon furniture in London.

*MR. HARCOURT said he could not. Goods made in English prisons, such as baskets and mats, were used in Government offices, and he thought that a very proper source of supply.

MR. CLAUDE HAY asked if any goods made in foreign prisons were bought.

*MR. HARCOURT: Certainly not to his knowledge. He believed that no goods made in foreign prisons were bought for Government offices. The Orange Street Waterworks were necessary for the supply of public offices as well as palaces, and London was indebted to them for the fountains in Trafalgar Square. Certain sanitary improvements had been found to be urgently necessary, and he had carried them out a little in advance of the authority of Parliament.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) moved the reduction of the vote by £100 as a protest against the item of £80,000 for official residences. The right hon. Gentleman's answer that the plan was made by the late Government was no excuse for the extravagance of the scheme. He ventured to think that the bulk of the right hon. Gentleman's supporters would agree that for the House of Commons to vote £80,000 for two residences for officials of any sort was a monstrous thing. It was quite clear that there was yet time for repentance. He was aware that the expenditure was part of a plan for some ornamental buildings, but surely the place could be used for more ornamental purposes than for two people to live in. On page 46 of the Estimates there was an item of £1,000 for a passenger lift at the Admiralty

Office and £1,450 for another passenger lift at the Foreign Office. He had had a good deal to do with passenger lifts, and he knew they could be obtained for less than half that money. Why should the taxpayers be called upon to pay such extravagant sums? This was an example of the way in which public money was being frittered away by the present Government. The sum of £10,580 was put down for the Meteorological Office at South Kensington. He noticed that that amount was required "on account," and therefore he thought they were entitled to some explanation as to what the total amount to be spent was likely to be. There was an item of £1,800 to replace two defective boilers in the Royal Law Courts. Everyone who knew about the value of boilers for heating knew that that was an exceedingly extravagant amount. A passenger lift was to be provided at the Royal Law Courts at a cost of £1,000. That also was an extravagant amount, and the Committee ought to take exception to it. He thought the work should be done for £500. It was proposed to pay £9,300 in the shape of an annuity to the Land Registry. He supposed he should be out of order if he pointed out how exceedingly useless an institution the Land Registry was. But the £9,300 was to be paid "on account." He thought the Committee were entitled to an explanation of that. An item of £8,000 additional was described as including works of a minor character not exceeding £20. There must be a great many of those minor works to make up an increase of £8,000.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £312,900, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. William Rutherford.)

*MR. HARCOURT said he had already, when replying to the hon. Member for the City of London, dealt with a number of the matters to which the hon. Member for the West Derby Division of Liverpool had referred. The building which was to be utilised for the housing of the two Admiralty officers formed part, not indeed of the Queen Victoria Memorial, but of the Queen Victoria Memorial scheme. The actual purpose to which the interior of the building would be put was not very material. It was thought best, however, to put it to the use proposed, for which part of it was more suitable than for public offices. In reply to the hon. Member's Question as to the amount to be spent on the Meteorological Office, he had to say that the amount was £10,580. As to the cost of the lift at the Royal Law Courts he might say that he had had some experience in the putting up of passenger lifts in private houses, and he knew that they were not so expensive as in public buildings. The hon. Member had said the work should be done for half the price proposed. If the hon. Member could provide an effective lift, including all the structural work, as well as the machinery, for less than £1,000 he would give him the job.

*MR. CARLILE said the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the two palaces at the Admiralty formed part of the Queen Victoria Memorial. In other words the right hon. Gentleman practically debarred the Committee from discussing the Vote.

*MR. HARCOURT said he could not allow the hon. Gentleman to make that statement. What he said was that the building formed part of the memorial scheme, not that it was part of the memorial itself. The late Government added it to the Queen Victoria Memorial scheme. He had no wish to bar discussion. The hon. Member must not say it was for that purpose that he stated that it was part of the Queen Victoria Memorial scheme.

*MR. CARLILE said the right hon. Gentleman might take that view of it, but it was not the view taken by Members amongst whom he sat. There had been previous discussions on the provision of these two palaces, and now the Vote was thrown at them in a way that practically closed the discussion. He protested against that. He thought it would have been better if the two residences had appeared in the Estimates as a part of the Memorial scheme, in which case no criticism would have been offered. To spend £80,000 in merely providing palaces for two officials appeared, on the face of it, to be a piece of gross extravagance. One of the residences was for the First Sea Lord. Sailors were not difficult to satisfy in the matter of accommodation. The size of these palaces seemed to be suggested by the size of the British Navy. Had the two individuals immediately concerned been consulted? He could not think they desired that such palaces should be provided for them. In view of the large outlay which the palaces would involve, he doubted whether the First Lord of the Admiralty and the First Sea Lord would be able to afford to live in them after they were built. He hoped that the Amendment would be carried to a division as a protest against such wasteful extravagance.

*MR. ANNAN BRYCE said that, in his opinion, there was some force in the objection raised on the other side to devoting these expensive buildings to the residences of officials. The officials had not salaries adequate to keep up such houses, and he agreed that it would be better to use them as public offices. He hoped the new buildings would not be so offensive to public taste as the Government offices recently completed in Whitehall. Anything more monotonous, tedious, and unworthy of the nation it would be difficult to imagine. He did not think that anyone would agree with the right hon. Gentleman that that building was of an ornamental character. It was like a building that a boy might make out of a box of bricks.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said that he desired some information in regard to an item of £40,000 for furniture for public offices. Some years ago, when a similar item was under discussion, it was ascertained that the supply of furniture for public offices had been practically in the hands of two or three firms in London, and a promise was then made that the practice should be discontinued, and that in the future the furniture should be tendered for, and that tenders should be open to firms, not only in London, but also in the provinces. He wished to know whether tenders had been invited for this £40,000 worth of furniture, and what publicity was given to the invitation for such tenders? He did not suggest that the right hon. Gentleman would be guilty of any trick of the kind—far from it: but it was quite possible to advertise for tenders in a newspaper which was not seen by anyone connected with the furniture trade. There was another point to which he wished to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. Many Members to whom he had spoken on the subject agreed with him that it would be a great convenience if another lift were constructed in that building.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are not on the House of Commons Vote now. The Vote is for the public offices.

*MR. HARCOURT said he would consider the suggestion which the hon. Member for Shoreditch had made. Anyone could be put on the list of contractors for furniture, so long as he could satisfy the Office of Works that he was competent to carry out the contract, and paid his men fair wages. He could not tell the hon. Gentleman at the moment in what newspapers the tenders were advertised for.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked when the Mall would be opened into Charing Cross?

*MR. HARCOURT said that it could not be opened until the new building was finished.

MR. DALZIEL: In one year or two?

*MR. HARCOURT: I am afraid it will be more than a year.

Question put.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) asked if the right hon. Gentleman could give them any information as to how long it would be necessary to exclude the public from the British Museum Reading Room? It was a very serious step to take in view of the fact that large numbers of people earned their livelihood at the Museum.

*MR. HARCOURT said it was estimated that the cleaning of the Reading Room would take six months, but arrangements were being made by which students would have the use of a large room capable of accommodating some 200 readers. He realised the great inconvenience it was to have the room closed, but after fifty-seven years it was necessary to do some cleaning. No pains would be spared to have the work completed as rapidly as possible.

MR. DALZIEL said he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for his reply, and would only appeal to him to make the choice of those who were allowed to use the large room as liberal as possible because, in many cases brought to his notice, it was a question of earning a living. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give attention to the matter, so that no one would suffer through the cleaning, which might entail great loss upon a large number of people.

*MR. HARCOURT said he would do what he could personally, but the hon. Member no doubt realised that he had no official control over the building.

Vote agreed to.

8. £91,000 to complete the sum for Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.

*MR. MORTON asked for information as to Linlithgow Peel or Palace. The walls were in a good state of repair, and he had never been able to see why a roof should not be put on the building. If the money could not be found in any other way it might be raised by public subscription in Scotland. If a roof were put on, the Palace, with the grounds attached, would be a very fine place. A few years ago Lord Rosebery suggested getting up a public subscription for the purpose of improving the Palace, but did not successfully carry out the movement, so that the building still remained in the same state. He was aware that the Architects' Association in Scotland were all in favour of the building not being maintained as a ruin, but that a roof should be put on to it, as it was in quite a good condition for the purpose. His right hon. friend took a very intelligent interest in these old buildings, and he had no doubt that he had visited the Palace and made up his mind what ought to be done. He (Mr. Morton) was sometimes accused in these matters of being wanting in economy in dealing with public money, but he personally took a great interest in old castles and palaces, and he thought they should be maintained as being of historical interest. He had always contended that the Palace should be made fit for residential purposes, but he had never yet found a First Commissioner of Works with sufficient intelligence, such as he hoped the present occupant of the office enjoyed, to understand that it was essential that a roof should be placed on this building.

MR. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.) called attention to the fact that a footpath between Holyrood park and King's park, Edinburgh, which in the interest of public safety ought to be lighted, was unlighted. He understood that communications had taken place between the corporation of Edinburgh and His Majesty's Board of Works, and they had agreed that it was in the public interest that that path should be lighted. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to put money on the Estimates to carry out the scheme this year, but he would press him to do so if possible.

*MR. HARCOURT was afraid his hon. friend the Member for Sutherlandshire would be as much dissatisfied with his intelligence as he had been with that of his predecessors. He had, it was true, taken a great interest in Linlithgow, and he had made inquiries as to what were the possibilities. He did not as a result think they could put a roof on the old walls, as it would involve the erection of skeleton steel frames to carry the roof apart from the walls. That would be a very costly operation, and he preferred Linlithgow as it was, in other words as a venerable and valuable ruin, than to have it with a new roof. As to the lighting of the footpath referred to, the matter had been laid before him and he would take care that it was dealt with before next year.

Vote agreed to.

9. £32,400 to complete the sum for Houses of Parliament Buildings.

MR. MORTON asked for information with regard to the item of £4,150 for furniture on page 21. He wished to know how much of that amount was for furniture for the House of Commons, and how much for the House of Lords. He desired to have the information because he believed that the House of Lords was a very expensive institution, and that it was costing the country a good deal more than it was worth.

*MR. HARCOURT said he was afraid he could not give the information asked for, because in this matter they treated the Houses of Parliament as a whole. In all probability, however, a very small proportion of the amount would be required for the House of Lords, because that august body sat so seldom and for such short hours that it was practically impossible for them to wear out their carpets and furniture in the same way as the House of Commons.

MR. J. WARD urged the necessity of separating the accounts of the House of Lords and the House of Commons. The House of Lords was an institution antiquated and useless—at least a good proportion of the people thought it useless—and Members of the House of Commons should be given an opportunity of saying whether the time had not arrived when they who voted the supplies should cease to do so for an institution which performed no useful function whatever in the Constitution. The accounts of the two Houses should therefore be separated in order that the House of Commons might see whether they were getting value for money. Under no circumstances could the House of Lords be described as a representative body. The two institutions were absolutely hostile in character, and that was another reason why the accounts should be separated.

*MR. HARCOURT said that it was impossible to separate the accounts of the two institutions which, although extremely different in character, occupied a common building, and therefore all requirements such as electric current, water, fuel and gas, etc., were taken in common. He could not, for instance, without having very elaborate meters to measure the gas consumed in this House and that emitted in the other possibly separate such an item as that. He sympathised with the ultimate object of the hon. Member, and when the hon. Member went tiger hunting across the lobby, he hoped to accompany him either as loader or beater. It would not, however, be the act of a prudent shikari to go into the cover and disturb the game in advance with a pop gun. By separating these items they would only make members of the other House uncomfortable, whereas what they wished to do was to make that institution not uncomfortable, but innocuous.

10. £2,100 Salisbury Memorial.

*MR. HARCOURT in moving to report progress, said that he reserved the Vote for his own salary in deference to the desire that had been expressed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. J. A. Pease.)

MR. MORTON said he objected to adjourning at that hour; they had a long evening before them. There were several Bills on the Paper, and surely under those circumstances the House might be allowed to continue its labours. He appealed to the hon. Member to allow the House to continue, because if it did nothing else it would perhaps enable him to advance his Railway Tickets Bill which he had been waiting to bring before the House for fifteen years.

MR. J. A. PEASE said the reason why it was impossible to meet the views of the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire was that this was one of the allotted days devoted to Supply; if any other business were taken it would not rank as an allotted day and would therefore be lost. It was for that reason and no other that he moved the adjournment of the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at a quarter after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 9th April, 1907.

Return to show date of launch, displacement, horse-power and armaments reduced to one common scale (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 129, of Session 1906.)—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Population of Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the population of Ireland at the different decennial periods from 1841 to 1901 respectively; and what is the estimated population in 1906.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.)—

Census of 1841	-	Population	8,175,124

Use of Cotton-stalk Fibre for Paper Making.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any information is in possession of the Colonial Office regarding the use of cotton-stalk fibre for paper making; and, if so, whether he will cause such information to be forwarded to British Central Africa for publication in the Gazette of the Protectorate.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) There is apparently no information on the subject of my hon. friend's Question in the possession of the Colonial Office; but inquiry is being made with the view of transmitting to the British Central Africa Protectorate any information which may seem likely to be of value.

Cost of Construction of Uganda Railway.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the figure £5,502,592, given by him as the total cost of the construction of the Uganda Railway, includes interest on the capital expended; and, if not, whether a sum of £160,000 more or less per annum during and since construction should be added, in order to arrive at the cost per mile to the taxpayer.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The sum of £5,502,592 does not include interest on the capital expended. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question I would refer him to the Answer given to the hon. Member for Preston on 28th February, in which the following statement was made:—"Nothing is chargeable to the line for interest and there is no debt accumulated for unpaid interest. The funds for construction were borrowed from the Consolidated Fund, and are being repaid by annuities charged on the Vote for Colonial Services." A statement of these annuities is given on page 2 of the Parliamentary Paper, "Uganda Railway Acts, 1896 and 1902, Account for the period ended 31st March, 1906," and the total amount which will be repaid by means of them is £7,909,294 12s. 6d. Deducting from this the amount mentioned above, the total amount which will be paid for interest is £2,406,702 12s. 6d.

Repayment to Civil Contingencies Fund.

MR. HADDOCK (Lancashire, North Lonsdale): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury when will the Estimate in respect of repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund be presented.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Probably in July.

Welsh Education Department Staff.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the President of the Board of Education if the existing officers and clerks of the Board of Education now assigned to the Welsh Department will continue to have access to, and be subject to supervision by, the permanent secretary to the Board.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) There is nothing to add to the Answer given to this Question when put on 13th March by the hon. Member for Aston Manor,† except that as regards the examiners in the Welsh Department the Answer to the hon. Member's Question is in the negative.

Metropolitan Police—One Day's Rest in Seven.

DR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state how many inspectors, sergeants, and constables it is calculated must be added to the Metropolitan Police Force to give each man one day's rest in seven.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The required number of officers of each of these ranks would be twenty-seven inspectors, 138 sergeants, and 1,378 constables.

Metropolitan Police Library Fund.

DR. COOPER: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total amount subscribed by the Metropolitan Police to the Library Fund for the year ending 31st December, 1905; how many new books were purchased during the year, and at what cost; how much was expended upon newspapers; whether any statement of this expenditure is published, and where; and whether, as a large majority of the subscribers do not live in the section houses, but are either householders or lodgers, and as such compelled to pay the local free library rate, he will consider the advisability of confining the library subscription to those men who reside in the section houses.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The detailed figures for the year 1905 are not available, but the total amount subscribed for the year ending 31st December, 1906, was £883. Of this sum, £254 was spent on books and £359 upon newspapers and periodicals. The statement of expenditure has not been published, but there is no reason why it should not be, and this can be arranged. Police libraries are open to resident and non-resident officers alike, and are used by both classes. If the subscription was confined to residents the amount raised would be insufficient to maintain the libraries. The system appears to meet with the general approval of the Force, and no complaints have been received with regard to it.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty with reference to the Report of the Departmental Committee on Engineer and Marine Officers which the Board are now considering, whether he will undertake that no changes of an extensive character will be made on the lines of that Report without opportunity being given for discussing them in this House.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. LAMBERT, Devonshire, South Molton): Until the Report has been fully and finally considered, it would be unusual and premature to make any statement as to any action on the part of the Admiralty.

Repatriation of Chinese Coolies.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, having regard to the fact that in the year from the 1st July, 1905, to 30th June, 1906, which is the latest period for which figures are available, 1,840 Chinese coolies were repatriated as permanently incapacitated for work owing to physical infirmity or disease, he will inquire into the mortality among these coolies on their return voyage to China; and will he consider whether the number of such coolies put on board ship in a moribund condition should not be included in the statistics of mortality among Chinese coolies employed in the Transvaal.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I have no information beyond that contained on pages 28 and 29 of Cd. 3338.

SIR H. COTTON: Will the Secretary of State be good enough to obtain the information?

MR. CHURCHILL: I shall be glad to get as much information as possible for the House of Commons, but this is not a matter for which the Colonial Office is now responsible.

SIR H. COTTON: But the information asked for relates to a period when this Government was responsible.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am sure the Colonial Government will be willing to give what information it can, and I will see if this is information which we can properly ask for.

Mr. Stead and the Hague Conference.

MR. HADDOCK (Lancashire, North Lonsdale): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will lay upon the Table the instructions given to Mr. W. T. Stead prior to his mission to European Courts in connection with the forthcoming Hague Conference.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): There had been no such mission which had any connection with His Majesty's Government.

House of Commons Police.

MR. HADDOCK: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department from what Vote the increased cost of police periodically engaged at the House of Commons during the last few months will be met.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The cost of the extra police from time to time engaged within the precincts of the House of Commons is charged to the House of Commons Vote. The cost of extra police employed in preserving order in the streets contiguous to the House is chargeable to the police fund, and therefore not on the Votes.

Royal Scottish Museum.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): On behalf of the hon. Member for North-West Lanarkshire, I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he proposes to remove the buildings adjoining the south side of the Royal Scottish Museum, in order to provide for the safety of the museum against fire, in view of the fact that the iron shutters recently erected afford no more than a temporary method of dealing with this danger.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): I regret that I am unable to give the hon. Member any pledge as regards the removal of the buildings adjoining the south side of the Royal Scottish Museum. Within the last five years two houses have been purchased and demolished on this side, because they constituted an imminent risk from fire. But the immediate danger having been removed, I am not prepared at present to suggest any further charge upon public funds.

LORD BALCARRES: On behalf of the hon. Member for North-West Lanarkshire, I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, if the defects in the existing system of heating and ventilating the Royal Scottish Museum will be entirely remedied during the forthcoming year.

MR. HARCOURT: The reply to this Question is in the affirmative.

Lune Fishery Board.

MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he is aware that the Lune, Wyre, Keer, and Cocker Fishery Board refused, on 16th March, 1907, an application from the Ingleton Angling Association for a general licence, although the latter offered to pay £5, to provide a watcher, and to spile and stock the streams; and whether, in view of the provisions of the Acts as to the obligation of the Lune Fishery Board to grant a general licence to duly qualified persons offering to pay such sum as the Conservators may determine, with the sanction of the Board of Fisheries, he will say what steps he proposes to take in order to bring about a settlement of this dispute between the Conservators of the Lune Fishery Board and the executive of the Ingleton Angling Association.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): The Board of Agriculture are informed that the Lune Fishery Board refused the application of the Ingleton Angling Association on the ground that the consideration offered was insufficient. Negotiations on the subject are, however, still proceeding. The Board have no statutory authority to intervene in the matter, but will be very glad to do anything in their power to assist in the satisfactory settlement of the question at issue.

Irish Attorney-General's Clerk.

MR. HADDOCK: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state why, in Civil Service Estimates, Class 3, Vote 14, page 307, a new allowance to the Irish Attorney-General, for clerk £100, appears.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The allowance in question has been added to the Estimates because the Government are satisfied of the necessity for affording clerical assistance to the Attorney-General for Ireland. The amount is very much less than is voted for similar services to the English and Scottish Law officers.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

PUBLIC RIGHTS OF WAY BILL.

FRANCHISE AND REMOVAL OF WOMEN'S DISABILITIES (No. 2) BILL.

"To establish a single Franchise at all elections, and thereby to abolish university representation and to remove the Disabilities of Women," presented by Sir Charles Dilke; to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 147.]

TERRITORIAL AND RESERVE FORCES BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) rose to move, "That this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the forces of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for home defence, or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field." He said: As I came into the House I took from the Vote Office a copy of the Secretary for War's latest Memorandum, showing how various enactments are affected by his Bill. I have not had an opportunity of studying this latest handbook to the scheme of the Secretary for War, but, thanks largely to the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, I have read carefully the Memorandum laid yesterday, which is distinctly a handbook to the Bill. In that the right hon. Gentleman pleads once more for a general approval of the whole of his scheme. I wish we could give it, but we cannot. This Memorandum does not dissipate the doubts which we entertained after listening to his first description of the scheme. I might almost say that in some particulars it confirms those doubts, but it is an extremely lucid document, and makes it easy for me to state shortly the case which, as we conceive, lies against the whole scheme. In the third paragraph the Secretary for War states that "establishments may be raised or lowered from time to time to suit the exigencies of the moment." That is a somewhat surprising statement, and certainly it is a statement which will not stand if the right hon. Gentleman is contemplating, as he very properly is, the provision for a considerable oversea expedition of a definite size to be maintained during a specified period. For if part of the scheme consists in making provision for such a force, then, if you lower your establishments later to suit the exigencies of the moment, the practical part of the scheme has to encroach still further on the speculative part. Then you must also provide for taking from the Territorial Force so much as is needed for your expedition, and so much more as may be needed for the expedition when you have reduced their establishment. You must see to it, also, that what you wish to take shall be worth taking. In this Memorandum the right hon. Gentleman goes on to appeal for continuity in military affairs, and asks that the country, in order that such continuity may be maintained, shall approve the system on which the military administrators are at work, and uphold that system in spite of defects which may be pointed out by critics. I agree at once that flaws can be found in any scheme, however homogeneous. But what if it should turn out that this scheme, partly because it departs from the continuity of past administration, is no system and is bound to break down? It cannot then be approved. This scheme embraces two plans—first, the practical plan for providing, despatching, and maintaining a large oversea expedition. We find many merits in that plan, and some grave defects. Secondly, there is the speculative plan for creating out of the existing

Auxiliary Forces a new Territorial Force. We think that plan visionary under the conditions of the proposal. Above all, we said that the two plans, the speculative and the practical, are not correlated in this scheme, and that there are no adequate or practicable provisions for making the Territorial Force do what it must do if it creates an expeditionary force of the size contemplated. The Secretary for War is perfectly cognisant of the necessity that his second line should support and expand his first line. That is the burden of his song. The right hon. Gentleman quotes in the Memorandum the classic passage in the Report of Lord Elgin's Commission—

> "No military system will be satisfactory which does not contain powers of expansion outside the limit of the Regular Forces of the Crown."

But there are no powers for expansion in this scheme. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Commissioners did not mean what he means when they wrote those words; they contemplated two definite matters; they laid down that there must be an oversea obligation lying upon the second line, and, in the second place, that there must be compulsory training in time of peace in order that men should be fit to discharge their duties in time of war. Both of these recommendations are ignored in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is almost like playing with words to quote that passage and to ignore those two recommendations. The Secretary for War has adopted neither for his Territorial Force, and he abolishes the Militia, to which the first obligation of oversea service might easily have applied, and to which the second obligation of compulsory training in time of peace might conceivably have been applied in the future if needed at any time. That being so, I claim that this system is no system; it is not systematic; it is incoherent in that it creates a great gap between the first and second line of the force it contemplates. With that I pass to the Bill itself. The right hon. Gentleman has objected to legislation by reference, and, although Clause 9 somewhat bristles with applications of the Army Act, in the main the Bill is not an instance of legislation by reference. But it is a remarkable instance of legislation by regulation. I have never seen a Bill which purported to do so much by regulation after obtaining the general assent and sanction of the House. I do not make any great complaint of that, provided that it is clearly understood that this is an enabling Bill of the widest possible description so far as the Army Council is concerned, and to that extent a disabling Bill so far as this House is concerned. If we once pass this Bill we shall part for ever, to an unusual extent, with our annual control over the forces of the Crown, and, to an unprecedented extent, with our financial control over the Auxiliary Forces. We shall authorise the Army Council to take any steps covered by the very wide provisions of this Bill which they may think necessary in order to carry out any feature of the right hon. Gentleman's plan—in short, we shall launch the whole scheme on its long voyage towards the horizon of hope. This is the only adequate opportunity we shall ever enjoy of criticising any feature of the whole plan the merits of which we doubt, or to the demerits of which we take exception. I make these observations because some critics, including eminent men for whom I have great respect—Lord Roberts, and that brilliant writer who has been a brilliant soldier, the military correspondent of The Times—advise us to approve out of hand the practical part of the scheme affecting the Regular Army for despatching an expeditionary force, and to consider, as a separate affair, the speculative part for converting the Auxiliaries into a Territorial Force. With a very real and very sincere respect for some of those critics, I entirely demur from that course, and strongly advise the House not to follow it. You cannot consider the speculative part of the scheme affecting the Auxiliary Forces as a separate matter. It is not too much to say that the size, shape, and constituent elements of the Territorial Force in its final form in this Bill have been absolutely dictated by the size, shape, and constituent parts of the expeditionary force which the right hon. Gentleman also contemplates. For, in attempting to organise that expeditionary force, the right hon. Gentleman has, in his own words, to take the substance of the Militia and to embody it in 66 new third battalions; those two operations, covered by Clauses 29 and 32 of the Bill, involve the transfer of at least 60,000 men—I think it is more—from an auxiliary to a regular basis, and in that transfer and embodiment the Militia disappears. The scheme abolishes a force which is not ideal, I readily admit, but which practically, and with a great measure of success, has subserved three necessary purposes. It has given a stream of recruits for the Line, it has given us battalions to take the place of Regular battalions at Colonial stations, and thus liberated those Regular battalions to take their place in the fighting line. During the Peninsular War, as the right hon. Gentleman states in his Memorandum issued yesterday, it gave 100,000 men as drafts for the fighting line, and during the South African War it gave 50,000 more. His plan abolishes that force, and creates a Territorial Force to subserve, amongst other things, two purposes. It will take the place of the Regular battalions at Colonial stations, and it will provide drafts for the Regular Army. But this force is made up of material which must always be exclusively drawn from the Volunteers, a body of men who have never been expected to perform these services, except in an infinitesimal degree, and who perform their main obligation by training for home defence. If that is a fair description of the two aspects of the right hon. Gentleman's plan, it is not too much to say that the scheme raises questions of wide political interest not less than of grave Imperial importance. In the first place, it challenges the assent of at least three considerable bodies of opinion in this country. It challenges the assent of those who are attached by many ties to the Auxiliary Forces as they now exist—men who have served in these forces, men who hope to serve in them, men who have made considerable sacrifices of the purse in order to make these forces efficient. It challenges the assent of another body of opinion, relatively smaller, but still large and perhaps growing—those who, rightly or wrongly, think that a measure of compulsion, ranging from universal compulsory service to some revision of the Militia Ballot Act, is necessary if our military system is to be made efficient and fair between man and man. The third body of opinion which the scheme challenges is far smaller, but still considerable—those who object to what they call militarism and who demand economies on a larger scale in the military service of the country than are contemplated in the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. Unluckily, these three bodies of opinion do not agree among themselves. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Hear, hear."] Yes; but that they will have to be considered must be apparent to everyone, and particularly to the author of the scheme. Again, the Imperial gravity of the issues raised by the plan can hardly be exaggerated. It is not only the problem of home defence that must be considered. The Government must also consider the organisation of a considerable expeditionary force—a force much larger than was ever contemplated before the South African War—for despatch abroad to meet an Imperial need. In doing that it is essential to set up a model which our self-governing Colonies can imitate, and which we would wish them to imitate. In the opinion of the Opposition, the model of the Territorial Force that is included in this scheme is not one which can be followed by the self-governing Colonies. No one can pretend that the subject of military defence is popular. Indeed, we all recognise that the intricacy of the problem is inherent in the complexity of the Empire. Therefore the Opposition do not approach the consideration of the scheme in any Party spirit. Then why do we make themselves responsible for a reasoned Amendment which, if carried, must kill the Bill? We do so because the doubts which we originally entertained as to the soundness of the scheme have not been dispelled, and cannot be dispelled by further actuarial returns or by eloquent pleadings in favour of some great national ideal. These doubts can only be removed by the right hon. Gentleman retracing his steps and reconsidering his scheme at the point when he decided to abolish the Militia. We move the Amendment because we see some great defects in the scheme. In the second place we do not think the Territorial Force is adapted to the end of providing expansion and support for the fighting line, because we do not find that it is linked in any practical manner with the expeditionary force. In our view any Minister, in dealing with this very difficult problem, must follow one of two broad alternatives. He must either do what the Opposition would like to see done — develop the existing forces, perfect the Regulars, the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers, and adapt them, as far as possible, to that succession of mutual support which is the real and true aim of any sound military system; or if he despairs of that alternative, he must frankly abolish the present system, stock, lock, and barrel, and adopt a uniform system, which to be uniform and equitable must be compulsory. The objection which the Opposition urge to the scheme of the War Minister is that it is neither one thing nor the other. In the speculative part of his scheme, creating the Territorial Force, the right hon. Gentleman embodies the outward appearance, and to some extent the inward construction, of a compulsory system; but, having done that, he relies entirely upon voluntary effort. The Opposition do not believe such a plan will work. If the system is to be uniform, it must be compulsory. If it is to be voluntary, it must be varied to meet the different needs of all sorts and conditions of men. I pass from the speculative plan for creating the Territorial Force to the practical plan for creating the expeditionary force. In the scheme, one plan or the other had to predominate. The practical plan has triumphed, and the speculative plan has one to the wall. It is in order to make practical the part of his plan dealing with the expeditionary force, in order to ensure that such a force could be sent abroad and properly maintained when so sent, that the Secretary for War has taken the substance of the Militia under Clause 29. It is for this purpose he has to recruit for the Army Reserve under Clause 11, and for this purpose he invites men to take over-sea service under Clause 12. Under this plan the Secretary for War subjects the Territorial Force to precisely the treatment of which the Militia complained, and for complaining the Militia is to be abolished. What, then, is gained by the plan? The Regular Army will be larger by 60,000 men at the expense of the Militia, but the men are to be attracted by expedients which nobody can call satisfactory, and which nobody will adopt unless driven to the plan by sheer necessity for the organisation of an expeditionary force of this kind. The Regular Army will contain elements hitherto not thought worthy of being contained in it, and the Auxiliary Forces will be completely divided from the Regular line. In defence of his plan the Secretary for War quotes Lord Elgin's Commission, and this expeditionary force dominates the whole of the plan; it dooms the Militia and subjects the new Territorial Force to precisely the treatment which led him to find justification for abolishing the Militia. But I need not labour the point. All those who defend the right hon. Gentleman's scheme are military men or the mouthpieces of military men, and they dwell on the practical aspect of it; they find it good to have an expeditionary force so organised that they need not bother about anything else, and they regard the speculative part of the plan with a philosophic spirit that the right hon. Gentleman would admire were he not troubled with War Office difficulties. All his calculations, he said, were based on the complete mobilisation of the first line. The first thing to consider is readiness for mobilisation, and no army is worth anything if not ready to take the field. This, it is to be observed, applies only to the expeditionary force, not to the speculative plan for a Territorial Force. It is true he has said something else which seems to be in conflict with that view. He said, also, that so long as we had to maintain a large force in India and at Colonial stations we should require a Regular force of almost similar size at home. ["No, no."] At any rate, that appears to be so according to the scheme, but I cannot now cover the whole of it. The right hon. Gentleman said we were justified, having the material at home, in putting it into the most useful form possible; but is it necessary to abolish the Militia and to subject the new force to conditions under which the Militia so long suffered? If the right hon. Gentleman fulfils the expectations he has raised, and if he ever reduces the numbers for the Regular Army, there will be no necessity for his elaborate calculations. The scheme is not the ripe fruit of long consideration with friendly conferences with the Yeomanry and Militia; it is notoriously the more precipitate result of a hitch and failure to arrive at a satisfactory agreement between the Army Council and the Militia colonels. In his Memorandum of April 8 the Secretary for War told us that the bond of union between the Militia and the Regular Forces is severed, because, in 1901, the Militia Reserve was abolished. But a great many things have happened since 1901, in spite of which the right hon. Gentleman did not despair of preserving the Militia. There is a reduction of the Regular Army, and other steps are taken which tend to diminish the Reserve. The three-years' men are done away with, the establishments of the home battalions are reduced, and yet we are told the Regular Reserve will number 115,000, and I see in the Memorandum the actuarial department put the number at 121,000. But I do not believe that 115,000 will be provided, and I am sure 121,000 will not be. These actuarial calculations are a sort of widow's cruse, to which the right hon. Gentleman resorts when pressed by criticism. It is the exigency created by reducing the Regular Army and diminishing the Reserves which make the difficulties, already great, so much greater that the negotiations have broken down. These negotiations having broken down, this dubious device is resorted to for drafts as part of a practical plan. The Secretary of State says—

> "Either the Militia must be available for drafts, or . . . they must give up to the Line the men who have enlisted for six years."

The noble Lord the Under-Secretary, in another place, said—

> "The Secretary of State has been obliged to modify his view, because the representatives of the Militia would not modify their view on drafting."

It is the failure of these negotiations, conducted in circumstances created by the right hon. Gentleman, that has led him precipitately and mistakenly to decide on the abolition of the Militia. The exigencies of the situation demanded it, says the right hon. Gentleman, and for that purpose and no other he took the "substance" of the Militia. The change is unnecessary and unwise. It is unnecessary because there is every reason to believe that the Militia, and certainly the Yeomanry, dislike the scheme in its present state more than in its original shape. It is also unwise. We have been taught the necessity for maintaining an expedition such as is contemplated for more than six months; the South African War lasted for two and a half years. We have been taught the necessity for providing an increased force for Colonial garrisons. These things the Militia do, perhaps not in an ideal way; still they do it in a way there is no reason to believe the new force will do better. The change is, therefore, unwise. But if the Secretary of State for War really means that, when the South African garrisons are reduced, he can still further reduce the Regular Army—and many people think that—then the change will be insane. If the Regular Army is further reduced, there must be a greater number of special Reservists in order to have an expedition at all. The practical part of the scheme will break down with further reductions of the Regular Army. From that point of view the change is unwise; but it does not end here, for the special Reservists will not have adequate training. The men on whom reliance will have to be placed as the pivot of the scheme will have to be trained in existing depots, not convenient places, for they will not hold a battalion; the men will have to be trained 120 at a time. Nobody has ever tried such a method since David made an army by hiding men by fifties in a cave. They will have no more training than the Militia now have, and what musketry training will they get with the difficulties in the way of getting ranges? They cannot be properly trained under the conditions proposed. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he has had some success in the matter of winter training; that may be so, but what success will he have when he takes the worst form of recruit obtained at the present time by the Militia, the least teachable man, and tries to teach him in so short a time all that he is required to know? As the depot is occupied, the recruits for the second battalions cannot be trained in the depot. There cannot be battalion training at the same time as recruit training. The right hon. Gentleman has pleaded for continuity in military administration. Might I remind him that not so long ago administrators for whose judgment he would entertain respect—men such as Lord Wolseley and Sir Evelyn Wood—insisted more than on any other aspect of the problem on the necessity for progressive training? They said they could not have battalion training at all if the battalion officers were to take over raw recruits from day to day, week to week, and month to month. There is one other defect in the practical part of the scheme—the deplorable expedient, as I consider it, which has been hastily adopted in order to ensure the number of recruits who now come out of the Militia into the Line. We are getting 12,000 recruits out of the Militia into the Line. Shall we get them out of the special contingent? The right hon. Gentleman thinks so. The military correspondent of The Times has said so. But I doubt it. They would all be taken from the Militia, because these, in the words of the Secretary of State, are the men who cannot get a job. It does not follow that they will all be got for the special Reserve. Many of the young men who join the Militia join it because they want, as they will say, "to see what it is like." They mean by that to see what serving in a battalion is like. They will not see what it is like if they go to a small depot to be grounded by a major and four captains whom they had never seen before and will never see again. How many will be tempted by the six months job under these conditions if it entails also an obligation to over-sea service at a moment's notice, serving under officers whom they have never seen, such service being a severe handicap in the competition with their fellow-citizens in civil life to get other jobs? In regard to the practical part of this plan, therefore, affecting the Regular Army, we have these three grave defects: our special Reservists in sixty-six third battalions will not be trained as well as everybody has said Regular soldiers ought to be trained; the training of the second battalions will be impeded; and the source of recruits on which we depend for the life of the Army will not be secured, but will be imperilled. Each one of these grave defects sprang solely out of the change made by the departure from the original plan and this hasty expedient adopted in its place. I almost hope I am forcing an open door. Why is it too late for the right hon. Gentleman to consider the propriety of retracing his steps? The Irish fragment of the original scheme is retained. Let the right hon. Gentleman make the rest of the plan conform to that fragment, and deal similarly with the Yeomanry. Without some such assurance and an explanation which will allay the apprehensions of danger lurking even in the practical plan of organising an expeditionary force, the Amendment must be pressed to a division. When I pass to the plan for creating a new Territorial Force I would ask and attempt to answer only two questions. What material will be left out of which this force is to be created, and will it really support and expand the fighting line? The Militia are gone, so I turn to the Yeomanry. What will be left of the Yeomanry? The Yeomanry is now in a satisfactory state, thanks to its recent more liberal treatment. If we make the reduction from 5s. 6d. to 1s. 5d.; if we abolish the system of catering which they understand and like, and put in its place the Army ration, we shall largely extinguish the present class of Yeomanry. They may take a greater obligation in peace on the present terms and be prepared to fight side by side with the Army on Army terms and Army rations in war. But they are not, if I understand them, inclined to train in times of peace at Army rates and on Army rations. Their standard of living and standard of self-esteem must be considered. The prosperous farmer's son and the bank clerk will not sacrifice a happy holiday to go out and wash, cook, and scavenge and eat the kind of food to be given them in this proposed training; although in war time they will rough it with anybody. The soldier is not asked to do all that will now be asked of this class, to learn to drill, to ride, and to do fatigues all at once inside a fortnight. The private soldier has his permanent cook-house, his dining and recreation rooms, his canteen and coffee bar, and the funds from various institutions husbanded by skilled advisers. The scheme as applied to the Yeomanry seems to be symmetrical, but it is almost absurd. This class will be lost; and it is to be borne in mind that it is the most teachable class, the only class that can be taught in the short time of training. To what class can we then appeal? To the class "that come to get a job;" but that class will go for six months, and not for fifteen days or eight days. On the hypothesis that they can be got they will be of no use, for they cannot learn anything in the time; and in attracting them the War Office will be competing against themselves and drawing them away from the special reserve on which the practical part of the plan depends. The same reasoning applies to the Volunteers. It cannot be thought that the Volunteer corps can all be satisfied with 1s. 3d. and Army ration, and all trained on a uniform and symmetrical plan. Supposing such difficulties as are thus suggested are surmounted in the only way in which they can be surmounted, by the provision of a great deal more money in regard to their camp allowance, it is idle to disguise that they will be less adaptable than the Militia and Yeomanry to the Regular régime. I may be wrong in this particular, but I do not think so. I believe you could impose conditions upon the Militia and Yeomanry, such as the imposition of oversea obligations, and by treating them as regular soldiers, which, though they may not like them at first, will eventually be accepted by them provided you do not abolish the Militia on the one hand and ask the Yeomanry to acomplish difficult tasks under impossible conditions on the other. But such obligations are less appropriate to the Volunteers. They are to be administered by county associations largely composed of civilians, while their constitution will be drawn up by the Army Council. The men under Clause 2 are to be trained and commanded always by Regular soldiers. There are to be fourteen divisional generals and forty-two brigadier-generals. I think Mr. Broderick must wish that he was in the House. The staffs of the three Army Corps which were to be formed under his scheme "pale their ineffectual fires" before the fourteen divisional generals and the forty-two brigadier-generals. And the Army Council is to retain the command of the first, and the Army Council is to decide how much money one association is to get, and how little money another association is to get. The powers of the associations are to be regulated by the Army Council. The men are to be enlisted out of the Territorial Force into the Army Reserve. The men are to be asked to accept an obligation for oversea service. Many a Secretary of State has made that proposal to his military advisers. In my day they would not hear of it. I do not know whether the Volunteers have changed their mind, but they described it as a plan for dividing the sheep from the goats. I remember bringing it forward myself in this House, and I remember that an hon. friend said that I made a very good speech, but that the less that was heard of it in the future the better. It lasted forty minutes by the clock on a June afternoon, and the next man on the Government Bench was put up to say that the Government had abandoned that idea. If you apply all these provisions to your Territorial Force, which I think I have shown will be almost exclusively composed of the Volunteers as we now know them, your Territorial Force will get smaller and smaller until it vanishes. But if you waive them all, then your Territorial Force will become quite valueless for the purpose you contemplate, namely for support and expansion in time of war. In any case they are under no obligation to undertake either the one duty or the other. I have tried to show that the scheme is not a whole, but that it is made up of two plans, one for a large expeditionary force which has many merits and some defects; and another of a speculative character to create a Territorial Force. I believe the second plan is a visionary plan, unless you are prepared to modify the conditions now to be found in this Bill. I say that the two plans are incompatible, since the first for an expeditionary force cannot succeed unless it depletes the Territorial Force, and that the Territorial Force cannot be kept at the numbers you desire unless you abandon the idea—and you ought not to abandon it—for an expeditionary force of 160,000 men maintained for six months. If you do not ask your Territorial Force to undertake these obligations for oversea service, then your plan for an expeditionary force breaks down altogether. Whatever happens to the one at the expense of the other, you have no plan under the Bill for adapting the Territorial Force to support the Regular Force. I may be told by the right hon. Gentleman that there are bridges in his scheme. I never quite understood what the right hon. Gentleman meant by that. When he talks sometimes of welding all our forces into one, and at another time, as a matter of the highest importance, of having two distinct lines, I do not quite understand him. But I say that if these bridges are to be a reality, and to be crossed in both directions by many persons, then I think the two lines—the two distinct forces—disappear. If generals are always to be crossing in one direction to command and to train, and if other generals, who are to sit as assessors at the board of the county associations, are to be always advising these associations that their men ought to enlist in the Army Reserve, and ought to undertake oversea obligations; if the Army Council lavishes money in counties where obligations are undertaken, and doles it cut penuriously in counties where the obligations are refused, then I say your idea of two lines is only a phrase, and the Territorial Force will be exposed to those very conditions which maimed the Militia to such an extent that the right hon. Gentleman felt justified in abolishing it. If you are to do that, it would be far better to keep the present system with the Militia and Yeomanry, who can be put under Regular officers, and who ought to be put under more stringent obligations, than to attempt to place these obligations on, and to put Regular officers so absolutely in command of, the Volunteers. Perhaps I shall be told that these bridges do not amount to much. Perhaps when the Volunteers realise all the conditions of this Bill we shall be told that the divisional generals and the brigadier-generals are only a temporary measure. We shall be told that Clause 11 inviting men to enlist in the Army Reserve is only intended for men on a non-regular basis, and to provide an ammunition column of men who know the handling of a rifle, but that it does not mean that the Regular Army is always to be bleeding the Territorial Force as the Regular Army has always bled the Militia. But, if we receive these assurances, then this talk about two distinct lines is not a phrase, it is a policy. I do not know which it is to be, but if it is a policy it is, in our opinion, a bad policy, and, above all, a bad policy for this country. We want in this country successive forces, one supporting the other. The universal experience of war preparation is that if it is to be effective it must be modelled on the image of war. It shows that what you need is such a continuous succession of waves to support the Regular Army, and it rejects altogether the dislocation resulting from two incongruous forces. We need such a succession of forces. That which is generally true is particularly true of our Empire, and we need such a succession of forces adapted to mutual support. You have now first the Navy, ready to fight at a moment's notice, then our Regular battalions abroad ready to fight without drawing on the Reserve, then the battalions at home ready to fight after drawing on the Reserve. And so we want the Militia and the Yeomanry placed under Regular officers, bound by oversea obligations to go oversea and fight when we are confronted by a great national emergency. Behind them we want the Volunteer Force ready to take their place when they have gone abroad under those conditions. This scheme provides nothing of the kind. It is incoherent, it is not in consonance with the genius of our people or the exigencies of our Empire, and it has this last and fatal defect. This scheme will prevent and delay the despatch of a regular expedition upon which so much care has been bestowed until after six months of war has elapsed. It may even, if unrest should prevail during that period of feverish preparation, inflict a graver injury on the State. It might tie down the Navy to the vicinity of these shores at a time when our national existence would depend upon our Navy being perfectly free to operate at any distance and in any direction. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'that,' in order to insert, 'this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the forces of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for home defence or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field.' "—(Mr. Wyndham.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The right hon. Gentleman opposite has held office in the War Office, and is, no doubt, an authority on military questions, to which he has devoted considerable attention, and as regards which in this House he has more than once shown conspicuous ability at a time when the House much needed encouragement. I trust he will understand that if my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War does not rise at once to reply to him as only some one who has had equal experience inside the War Office could, it is because my right hon. friend will have to reply on the debate. I therefore trust the right hon. Gentleman will understand that if some of the questions he has asked are left over it is in order that a fuller reply may be given later on. It is always a pleasure to listen to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He is a master of language and measured phrase beyond the reach of the ordinary man, and sometimes I have heard him use his gifts in such a way as to be exceedingly helpful to the House when in a difficulty. I cannot say I have found him so helpful this afternoon. The pleasure of listening to him was as great as ever, but the profit was not so great. Some of the right hon. Gentleman's points had, I think, but little substance. His first point was made on the statement in my right hon. friend's Memorandum that establishments may be raised or lowered from time to time to suit the exigencies of war. He took exception to that statement, but I think his objection was really not an objection of substance. That statement of my right hon. friend's meant that his scheme should have some elasticity, and if objection were taken to the statement as he intended it, it would be simply on the ground that it would be better to have a scheme which would have no elasticity. Then I think there is an answer to one or two other points. The right hon. Gentleman said that there are various sections of opinion to which the scheme of the Government has caused apprehension or dissatisfaction. He said that the section of opinion which is in favour of compulsion is not satisfied with it because it is not compulsory; while the section of opinion which depreciates too much military spirit is also not satisfied because there appeares to be too much military spirit in the scheme. The right hon. Gentleman said that unfortunately these various objectors do not agree one with another. He might have gone a little further and said, as I think fortunately for the Government, that these objectors answer one another. Someone must find grounds of dissatisfaction in any scheme of Army reform. The objection of the right hon. Gentleman that some sections of opinion are dissatisfied with this scheme really amounts to this—that it is impossible to produce any scheme of Army reform which will please everybody. That I fully admit. There is a difference of principle between us and the bench opposite on this question. It is shortly this. Right hon. gentlemen opposite consider that an effective scheme of Army reform ought to be one providing for organisation on at least three lines; we hold that if you organise on three lines you will increase expense and get, not efficiency, but confusion, and that a better plan is to organise on two lines. On that issue we are prepared to meet them. To organise on three lines is not practicable, but to organise on two lines will, in our opinion, give efficiency, economy, and strength. I will try to prove why we think so. My right hon. friend had three objects which he desired to secure in his scheme of Army reform. Any one who sets those three objects before himself, as he proceeds at the War Office to work them out, is inevitably led to the conclusion that his plan must be on two lines if those objects are to be secured. What had my right hon. friend in view? His first object was to organise the Regular Army at home and provide that it could be used abroad on the outbreak of war; in other words, that the country may be in a position to use, and use without delay in an emergency, the force for which it pays. I think as regards that point the fault which is found with the Government for having reduced the Regular Army is one of the letter only, and not one of substance. Numbers may be reduced, but power is increased. The question is not the numbers of your Regular Army, but whether you can use the numbers you have got. The scheme now before the House would enable us, on the outbreak of a serious war, to send abroad a larger force in less time and better equipped than before. It is true there is a saving of money, but it is natural there should be a saving of money. That is reached in this way. There are certain subsidiary services for which my right hon. friend will no longer provide by means of Regular Troops—the transport, supply, and medical services. He will provide for those from non-professional sources, the men provided for that purpose training with the Territorial Army. The right hon. Gentleman says that if we are going to induce those men to undertake oversea obligations, we shall deplete our Territorial Army, and diminish our power of expansion on the outbreak of war. No; because those particular men will be supernumerary. I maintain that my right hon. friend secures by his scheme efficiency and economy combined. We are always asking for economy. As regards the Army, we have for many years—I am not sure it is not true of both sides—believed there has been considerable waste, but when we do make a reduction of expenditure the question is at once raised on the other side: Are you not sacrificing efficiency? If there has been waste, however, it follows that it must be possible to have economy and reduced expenditure without impairing efficiency, and possibly with an increase of efficiency. The second object my right hon. friend had in view was that you should make provision which would enable you to maintain in the field for six months the force you have sent abroad. You must not only send it abroad, but you must have ready the organisation and material to maintain it in the face of the enemy for, at any rate, six months. This object my right hon. friend proposes to provide for by the special arrangement of the third battalions and the special contingent. It is a new arrangement, but we have been driven to have some arrangement for supplying drafts for the Army in the field, because we were left without any arrangement for supplying those drafts, and the Militia would not undertake to do it. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some arrangement. Here is where the root of the objection to the scheme before the House comes in. In providing drafts, in making your organisation to maintain the Regular forces in the field for six months, and to enable you to feed that force, you have necessarily by the logic of circumstances been brought into conflict with the Militia, which would not undertake the duty of providing the drafts. If, in a short sentence, the opposition to this Bill could be summed up, I think it might be summed up as a Militia opposition. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] Well, I listened to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and when I heard him dwelling on the question whether, after all, it would be necessary to divide upon the Amendment, it seemed to me that the question whether the Party opposite would divide on the Amendment would depend very much on the attitude of the Government towards the Militia. If it had not been for the attitude of opposition raised by the Militia question there would, I think, have been no Amendment from the Front Bench. As the hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield has not yet spoken, I think I am safe in saying that the strongest language up to the present used against the scheme has been that of the Duke of Bedford, who speaks on behalf of the Militia. He has spoken elsewhere in such terms of the special contingent and the special organisation for supplying drafts that I am not sure they could be repeated under the stricter rules which obtain in this House. They expressed the strongest possible dislike to the special contingent and these third battalions. I am not surprised that that dislike should have been expressed by any one in the Duke of Bedford's position, because the class which will be attracted into the special contingent is precisely the class of which, to a large extent, the Militia has hitherto been composed. Why should that excite disapproval in a Militia officer? It is because this is a limited class in our population. It consists of men who are very young, and who have not yet got into such employment that they cannot spare the time for a month or two's training. That is a limited proportion of our population, and, if you see in this Bill the destruction of the Militia, it is because, in the first instance, the special contingent and the third battalions will draw from that limited class a large amount of the elements upon which the Militia has hitherto depended. I understand, therefore, the Militia opposition to these special contingents; but the work of supplying the drafts to the Regular Army in the field must be secured somehow. If the Duke of Bedford and the Militia officers had assured us, or if right hon. Gentlemen opposite had been able to give us an assurance on their behalf, that they would supply the drafts for the Regular Army in time of war, then they would have had a case. If they had said they would do it better than the special contingent we should have admitted that that was a complete answer. But not only have they not said they would do it better; they have said definitely, emphatically, and finally, they will not do it at all. As regards supplying the drafts to the Regular Army, as regards the work of maintaining the Army in the field in time of war, the Militia has put itself out of Court, and my right hon. friend was bound to resort to some other method, if he was to be able to feed a force abroad. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has made considerable criticism, not from the Militia, but from the strictly military professional point of view, upon the training which will be given to the special contingent. My right hon. friend when he comes to deal with this question, will follow all those intricacies of detail, and explain precisely how we propose to carry out what we believe will be a satisfactory arrangement. These men will, at any rate, have as much training as the Militia have had. The right hon. Gentleman's contention is that they will not have a satisfactory training, and will be trained in such a way as to spoil the training which is given at the same time to regular battalions. We maintain the exact contrary. We believe they will get a training of a better quality than they would have had in the Militia, and we believe that that can be done without spoiling the training of the regular second battalions. I said the right hon. Gentleman opposite was a master of measured phrases. When he came to this point, however, I think his phrase was a little unmeasured.. He compared these special contingents to the men David took by fifties and hid in a cave. Was it David who hid them by fifties in a cave? In any case, if I remember rightly, the rations were very poor—these men were fed on bread and water. ["Locusts and wild honey."] Somebody said locusts and wild honey. My recollection of the men David trained is that they were exceedingly efficient, but even the right hon. Gentleman would not contend that there were already some regular troops in the cave who would be able to give an example and help to the special contingent. I repeat that the special contingent will, for the purposes of war, get a better training than the Militia have yet done, and that will be done without interfering with the training of the Regular troops. Those are the first two objects of my right hon. friend—to be able to send a force abroad and to be able to supply it with drafts for six months when it is in the field. Those are the first two paramount objects of Army reform, and you must make sure of those two objects before you proceed to anything else. You must secure a third object afterwards, but you must not secure that third object at the expense of either of those first two objects. The right hon. Gentleman complains that, when we come to our third object, which is that of providing for gradual expansion in time of war, and to secure which we organise on two lines, we shall produce dislocation and destroy the link which ought to exist between the Regular Army and the force behind it. His policy, as I understand it, is that you must organise on three lines, and that you must link these three lines one with another. Well, his Government had some years which they spent in attempting to organise on three lines. They found great difficulties. Have they really seen their way to overcome those difficulties? They have made more than one attempt. I could not help remembering, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite divided my right hon. friend's scheme into two parts, the practical and the speculative, that they had two plans which were not linked together. Was not there the plan of one War Secretary and then the plan of another? Was not one of those policies speculative and the other practical? We have not found out yet which of those was practical and which was speculative. The link between the Militia and the Regular Army was destroyed by right hon. Gentlemen opposite when they abolished the Militia Reserve. The right hon. Gentleman did not shirk that point. He admitted that they had destroyed the Militia Reserve, but, he said, a good deal has happened since then. There were the three years men. Were they to take the place of the Militia Reserve? But they were abolished by the Party opposite; and the three years men disappeared before the change of Government took place. The link had gone when the Militia Reserve was abolished, and what my right hon. friend has had to do has been to provide for gradual expansion in time of war, an organisation which, we believe, will be suitable to training and encouraging the military talent of the country. What sort of expansion do we want in time of war? We shall never attempt, and this country can never attempt, to overwhelm its foes by mass of men on land. Whatever big land war we engage in must, on our part, be a defensive war. It must be a war to defend, not a war to invade, in the sense in which Continental nations would invade each other. The object of each of the Continental nations engaged in a land war must be to overwhelm in mass of men, to reach the heart of the enemy's country and to overcome it by force. Our military problem will always be on land a defensive problem, and we have to bear in mind that, just as we cannot overwhelm in mass on land, so we cannot be overwhelmed ourselves. The Navy protects us against that. I do not want to go into the dinghy controversy, but what we have to provide against at home is, at most, a raid, and not to have to defend in mass. The assumption of the whole of our Army scheme is that the Navy keeps the sea communications open for us, and closes them to any one with whom we are at war. If the Navy cannot do that, the history of this country as a Great Power is at an end, and neither conscription nor any other system that can be devised will avail. Therefore, that is the assumption, and, if the Navy can fulfil that function, the country is protected absolutely. Distant places that can only be reached by sea communication are protected, but there do remain places of which India is most familiar to the House. There, with the frontier which we have, we shall not want men. We shall want, or we should want, if we are ever attacked, which, in my opinion, is an unlikely contingency—but, so long as it remains a contingency at all, it is something which must seriously be taken into account in our Army provision—not a great mass, but staying power and gradual expansion. And that expansion must be by units. How are you to produce, in the nation, that gradual expansion —it is gradual and not summary or sudden expansion that you want—in time of war? You must have an organisation in peace which can, in time of war, readily embody and train the Volunteers of the nation as a regular fighting force, and that is what my right hon. friend creates by this Territorial Force. The right hon. Gentleman says that all those who enrol themselves in the Territorial Force do not undertake any over-sea obligations. That is perfectly true. As regards any great war, we must, in this country, depend upon the patriotism of people who, in time of peace, have not undertaken any over-sea obligations. If you are to conduct successfully a great war, it can only be because such a war so appeals to the spirit and patriotism of the people of the country, because they so believe in the honesty and justice of their cause, that the question of whether a man has or has not undertaken an over-sea obligation is swept away by the wave of patriotism. Of course the Volunteers and Territorial Force will not undertake any over-sea obligations, and no nation has ever yet created a great army which has undertaken over-sea obligations. But the appeal which my right hon. friend wishes to make is to the nation as a whole, not to undertake over-sea obligations, but to enrol in a force which will enable them, voluntarily, if the time ever comes, to be trained at short notice to undertake any obligation which they are willing to undertake. If you are to do that, you must have something like a national organisation, and I believe you must have one organisation which will appeal to the nation as a whole. And that one organisation is the Territorial Army organisation proposed in the scheme now before the House—one organisation for all auxiliary and non-professional forces. What would happen if you attempted, under this scheme, two organisations instead of one for the Auxiliary Forces? For the Militia as it was you would not get the men, because they are being drawn away for the special contingent; and if, after providing a really efficient Militia organisation, you were then to proceed to provide a separate organisation for the Volunteers, you would incur great expense and get confusion and not efficiency as the result. The fact is that Lord Lansdowne really gave away the case as regards the Militia when he said the Militia had been plundered at one end for the Line and encroached on at the other end by the Volunteers. Yes, and if you follow that quotation out, you get, in my opinion, the corollary that if you are to maintain the Militia on its old basis, you can only do it by plundering the Line, or by encroaching on the Volunteers. The Militia, as it is, has no cavalry, no field artillery. Its strength has fallen, its officers are insufficient, the cost per head is increasing, the efficiency per unit is decreasing. If, as part of this scheme, you are to make it one of your objects to take the Militia up to its old basis, to provide cavalry and field artillery, and to get it to the strength at which you would wish to have it, you will find you have incurred very great expense, and if you are to proceed, after that, to organise behind that a third line, the Volunteers, you will soon find that your Army expenditure will run to an amount which I believe the country would not desire, and, as we believe, you would have created not efficiency but confusion. What has been the lesson of previous attempts at Army reform and of almost all Army questions for some years past? It has been that, inevitably, there has been confusion and waste. I believe that has been due, more than to any other one cause, to the attempt to organise on three lines instead of on two. What my right hon. friend proposes in his Bill is one Territorial Force which, as we believe, is adapted to attract every one in the nation who desires, voluntarily, to fit himself to defend the interests of his country, if need be. It is said that we shall not get the men. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite said that the Volunteers were the worst off. Although we are not giving 2s. 6d., that 2s. 6d. went very largely to pay certain charges from which the Volunteers will now be entirely free. Therefore, the argument of the 2s. 6d. cannot really be used to prove discouragement of the Volunteers. But those who say we shall not get the men hardly realise what we are proposing to do. When they do realise that we are proposing to ask the Territorial Force to undertake a more extended obligation than the Volunteers have previously undertaken—that is to say, to go out for six months at home in time of war—they will see that we are providing the Volunteers with the stimulus of responsibility that they never had before. I think the late Secretary for War, if he was correctly reported, once said that when he went to the War Office he asked what the Army was for, and he did not get a satisfactory reply. If he has asked what the Volunteers were for, I am sure he has never had a satisfactory reply. The Volunteers have been regarded by some sections of opinion as a plaything to be indulged in.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Twenty years ago.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I said there have always been some people who regarded the Volunteers as a plaything to be indulged in. I did not say I did, or that anybody in particular did. Is there nobody who in the last twenty years has ever held that view? There will be nobody if this scheme passes, for then, for the first time, it will be made perfectly clear to every one that the Volunteers do not exist for their own sake, but for the sake of the country; that they have a definite, real responsibility and obligation, and a definite place in the defence of the country. That does, in my opinion, provide a stimulus and a spirit to which, I believe, the Volunteers will respond. I have always believed that if you only made to the voluntary public spirit of this country an appeal which was intelligent, reasoned, and clear, and gave them to understand that the appeal was made, not merely to sentiment, but because they were really wanted to undertake certain obligations, you would get a response. The fact that you will get that response I believe accounts for the apprehension that my right hon. friend's scheme may create too much of a military spirit in the country. I do not believe it will. It may increase the military spirit, but, if so, it will, I think, do it in the sense of creating public spirit. I would much rather in this connection use the phrase "public spirit" than "military spirit." We shall, I believe, under this scheme develop and encourage the talent of the able-bodied men of the country to defend it; we shall undoubtedly encourage the power of defence. Is there a risk that in doing so we shall also stimulate a tendency to aggression in the population? If there were such a risk, we should have to take it; but I do not believe there is such a risk. Nobody can dislike more than he who has for long had to do with public affairs what seems to be a rising tendency to aggression in the country in the public affairs of which he is engaged. But if the Volunteers realise that voluntary training is undertaken with a definite object, it will make men more serious. It is not seriousness but levity that creates a tendency to aggression. I do not believe there is a danger of increasing the military spirit in any sense other than that which would be more correctly described as public spirit. Everybody admits that reform is needed. You cannot have reform without change. The right hon. Gentleman opposite complained that in our plan we shall depart from continuity. We were obliged to depart from continuity, because the plans of our predecessors have not succeeded in solving the problem. As you cannot have reform without change, surely let us beware of saying that change is a necessary objection to reform. If you are to attempt reform without touching the Militia, and, indeed, spending more money on the Militia, and without making a new appeal to the Volunteers, then I think you may have reform with the minimum of change, but with an exceedingly undesirable change. You will have eliminated change with regard to the Militia and the Volunteers from your scheme of Army reform, but you will have introduced a new and most objectionable form of change, and that is an increase of expense. I think the system of change on which this scheme is based is to reduce expenditure and to simplify and to solve the problem. Of course, it will not meet the views of those who think that conscription is the only remedy, but I do not understand that to be put forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. If conscription is to be put forward in this House as an alternative to the scheme of the Government, then it must be put forward openly, and we shall be prepared to meet it. It is not, as I understand, put forward as an alternative in this Amendment. When the right hon. Gentleman talked of the need of modifying this scheme he hinted very obscurely at the possible ultimate rejection of this Bill, if not here, in another place. If the Opposition push this Amendment to the Second Reading to a division, it will mean that they have taken up a line of irreconcilable and determined opposition. The Opposition have less right than usual to object to this measure. They have had their chance; they have had it for some years; they have had their two plans, and I have not heard any indication that anybody wishes those plans to be revived if right hon. Gentlemen opposite succeeded in turning us out and had an opportunity of dealing with this problem again. Those plans having disappeared, the present Opposition having had their chance for some years, it was our duty to approach this problem; and I could not help thinking, when the right hon. Gentleman said our scheme was now launched on its voyage towards the horizon of hope, it would be much more correct to say that our scheme is the first in recent years in which hope has appeared above the horizon. The right hon. Gentlemen opposite could not solve this problem when they had a majority; they cannot now they are in a minority, because they cannot act, and they cannot carry measures through this House. Although they cannot perform, there is left to them under the Constitution a power which I do not believe any Opposition ought to have—the power to wreck. It would be unfair in me to infer from the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that they have resolved upon any such policy; but we never know whether this temptation to attempt elsewhere what they cannot do here may arise and prevail later on. If that were to be so, I should say never was there a more illegitimate use of what I consider to be the undue power which the Constitution now gives to the minority in the House of Commons. The scheme that my right hon. friend has brought before the House comes before it backed by military opinion. I am aware that a section of military opinion would prefer conscription, and it does not like this measure because it is not conscription. But that being out of court as an alternative for the purpose of this debate, we are entitled to say that it comes before the House adopted by military opinion, and with the military approval of those who wish to see the voluntary system made a success. We may claim for this scheme that it has been conceived in no party spirit. I think that has always been admitted, and any recrimination or any reflection upon its predecessors has been singularly absent from my right hon. friend's speeches, considering how much material he might have made use of. We do not wish to make it a party question. It has not been hastily produced; it is the result of a thorough review of the whole situation, and it is earnestly recommended to the House as the most coherent, the best-thought out, and the most acceptable and effective scheme of Army reform which has been presented to Parliament in recent years.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): The military opinion which the right hon. Gentleman has given to the House in favour of this scheme is the same military opinion that was given to us by the predecessor of the present Secretary of State for War in terms equally strong; and in a book which the right hon. Gentleman published he has given chapter and verse for the approval of a diametrically opposite scheme by the three distinguished generals who have been referred to as approving of this new scheme. Therefore it is incumbent upon the House of Commons to consider this question for itself, and entirely apart from military opinion. One distinguished member of the Army Council has already expressed his opinion in favour of conscription. Therefore, I think the House of Commons must feel that it is our duty to settle this question for ourselves, and not be affected by the suggestion that certain distinguished generals have approved of this scheme, as they have approved of other diametrically opposite schemes. It is notorious that these distinguished generals are in favour of conscription, and time after time they have stated that none of these schemes will work, and that conscription is the only real solution of the problem. My right hon. friend has met the opposition in regard to the Militia, and I will not deal with that question. But I ask the House to consider the very grave doubts which some hon. Members entertain with regard to this scheme—doubts which do not diminish with careful consideration of the Memorandum laid before the House by the War Office. My sympathies are with my right hon. friend in his attempt to diminish the number of different services which exist side by side in this country, but I am amazed to hear the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs say that this is a scheme to diminish the cost. I am surprised to hear that statement from anyone who has carefully considered the question. There may be a temporary diminution of the cost by means which are very doubtful, but the statement that the scheme can be carried out within the limits of the figures presented to the House will easily be disproved before this debate ends. Admissions will be made by the Government; or, if they are not made, the scheme will be dropped, unless it is put in force in one or two counties experimentally. One of these two things must happen. Let us consider the results at which the Secretary of State is aiming, and the cost at which he expects to obtain those results. In this scheme all rests on the expeditionary force of 167,000 men. The numbers are an enormous increase on any that have hitherto been proposed; and the Foreign Secretary's speech was wholly lacking in any suggestion of why such a force should be needed at a moment's notice. No one suggests that an expeditionary force of 167,000 men is to go post haste to India at the beginning of a war. Both parties concur in the view laid down by the ex-Prime Minister, and the Secretary of State has expressly concurred in it, that the advance of Russia towards India, if it ever takes place at all, must be at a greatly diminished rate; it must take place by railways, and must be a matter of very slow progress. Therefore the expeditionary force cannot be intended for that purpose. Is it right that we should prepare our Army for operations of an immediate nature on this scale? I think the policy pursued by both Parties in the State up to the present time on this question of an expeditionary force is the wiser one. Our Imperial expenditure on land forces is already enormous—£20,000,000 in excess of the expenditure on our Fleet; while the reductions which have been effected on the Navy have been double those on the Army. In his Memorandum the Secretary of State for War said that his scheme is based on Cardwellian principles, and he went a little out of his way to propitiate my hon. and gallant friend beside me, and myself, by saying that Cardwellian principles were not necessarily concerned with linked battalions or particular terms of service. But Cardwellian principles are concerned with the cost of this scheme. To the seventy-four pairs of battalions now existing the right hon. Gentleman adds another seventy-four, so that in future there will be a treble fettering of the system round our necks; and then the right hon. Gentleman adds that this is the foundation of the particular size of his expeditionary force. I was astonished to hear that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover approved the size of this expeditionary force, for the Leader of the Opposition condemned it at the outset, on the ground that he could not conceive the circumstances for which it could be required, and that by implication it could only be intended for European complications. In that view I entirely concur. It is extraordinary how far the Secretary for War has gone in admitting that the gigantic size of this expeditionary force depends upon a mere accident. He has said—

> "The basis is that of the number of units actually in existence at home to find drafts for the force in India and abroad."

Then the right hon. Gentleman in February, in a debate in this House, asked himself the question, "Why fix on 160,000?" and his answer was, "Because I have all these men for another reason, to supply the drafts for India and abroad." Well, my right hon. friend has made a scheme for the despatch across the seas of an expeditionary force of 167,000 men, but it is necessary that we should press him more closely before we pass this Bill, for which we shall be responsible in the future, and in respect of which in the years to come we shall have to say what we meant by giving it our support. It will be necessary to ask many questions of the right hon. Gentleman. Even though the scheme may never come into operation except experimentally, yet the House of Commons will be failing fundamentally in its duty if it does not examine its details with the greatest care, in the light of the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. On 14th September, at Newcastle, the right hon. Gentleman, speaking of the Territorial Army, said—

> "Under this scheme, we might manage to maintain in the field an army of 700,000, of 800,000, or even of 900,000 men. The thing is within compass. It is possible to devise a system for a very much larger expansion than has been contemplated."

While desiring that the money spent on the Army shall be well spent, I cannot believe that, given our naval supremacy, we shall best consult the interests of the country by maintaining ready for instant despatch an expeditionary force of 167,000 men, besides our large peace garrison in India, and a Territorial Army capable of expansion to 700,000 or 900,000 men. The necessities of the Navy must come first, and it cannot be conceived that the country will year by year consent to its present expenditure on the Navy, and at the same time contemplate keeping up this expeditionary force with this Territorial Army behind it, as well as the enormous peace garrisons of our ports across the seas. On that I take issue with my right hon. friend, and if it is attempted to pass over the enormous figures, and to say that of these great forces the expeditionary force alone is real, and that the other is a dream possibly of the future, then I say that we must press the right hon. Gentleman more closely in order to know what is to be the scale of expenditure upon the Territorial Army for which we are prepared. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, like Paul, has been a little open to the charge of being all things to all men. Just as Paul said—

> "To them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law, that I might gain them that are without law."

So the right hon. Gentleman is a Regular to the Regulars, a Territorial Volunteer to the Territorial Volunteers, a little bit of a conscriptionist — [Mr. HALDANE dissented]—well, a friend of conscriptionists, and at the same time he is a leading pacifist to the pacifists. The right hon. Gentleman has stated in most emphatic terms that by this Bill he is erecting entrenchments and earthworks against conscription. But the Bill is being placed before the House on the advice of the Army Council, and the Army Council as individuals are in favour of conscription. ["No."] Two members of the Council have said so in public and the third leading Member said it in private on several occasions. It is notorious that the ordinary soldier at the present time is nothing but a conscriptionist. I do not think it is a real danger, but my right hon. friend is in the position of receiving support all round, and he quotes this support with approval. On 4th March my right hon. friend quoted by way of peroration, the declaration of The Times military correspondent; and it is notorious that the powerful articles of that clever soldier have contributed very greatly to the success of this scheme. This scheme will be carried undoubtedly, and it will be to that soldier that the great success of it will be in part due. It would, of course, be very largely due to the right hon. Gentleman himself, but The Times military correspondent was the right hon. Gentleman's chief backer in the Press. The Times military correspondent, in what he wrote, said that the scheme which he supported was a—

> "Leap in the dark. . . . It is better that we should know for certain that we cannot expect to create a serious national army by voluntary service than live in a fool's paradise."

My hon. friend the Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool said—

> "If the present scheme fails there are evil days in store for those who hold to the old ways of voluntary service, and the freedom of the subject."

The views that have been expressed by the supporters of two very diverse opinions—views of a similar tenor, show how necessary it is that the House should scrutinise the scheme closely. The War Office under this scheme are to get control of the Volunteers; but the form in which they are to be given that control is dangerous. A few years ago the Under Secretary for the Colonies wrote several letters to The Times in which he used language relating to the total misunderstanding of the Volunteers by the Regular soldier. My hon. friend wrote—

> "The War Office has always hated the Volunteers and sneered at them and despised them. That prejudice is still as strong as ever at headquarters. There is a feeling that but for the Volunteers we should have to adopt conscription, and then the War Office would have everybody's life and liberty to play with, which would make them very happy indeed."

The language used is, perhaps, too highly coloured, but the fact is that the Regular soldier has never understood the Volunteer, and it is accordingly urged that steps should be taken to prevent the Volunteer from being put under the Regular Army, bound hand and foot. I think the Volunteers ought to be represented on the Army Council itself. One of the reasons given for this prejudice by my hon. friend is that the War Office and the headquarters staff feel that the Volunteers stand between the country and conscription. There is, however, this difficulty about the scheme of my right hon. friend, that under it he destroys the present constitution of the Volunteers, and when once it is killed it cannot be revived. I believe that it will be very difficult to get the Volunteers to bind themselves for so long a period of service as that contemplated by the Bill. In the interim Report of the Committee on Officers it is pointed out that it will be—

> "Impossible for a young man of the professional classes to bind himself for longer than twelve months ahead."

But there will be the same difficulty with the working classes as well in respect of these long engagements. The Report of the Committee on Officers goes to prove and strengthen that statement, because it mentions a case where an experiment was tried as regards officers, and they say that the result of this appeal might afford a convincing proof of the statement they make, which is quite as true of the private Volunteer as it is of the officers. My right hon. friend, indeed, has failed to appreciate some of the advantages of the present voluntary system, which form a reason for going slowly and for examining closely the changes that are proposed. The right hon. Gentleman said that one of the scandals of our system is the non-correspondence of strength to establishment. Why? It may be so as to the Regulars and the Militia, but why as to the Volunteers? The establishment is merely nominal; it is fixed by the War Office, and corresponds to local feeling. It offers also this advantage, that in a period of strained international relations we can slowly, and without any mobilisation, recruit up to the larger scale. Why, then, get rid of that elasticity and adopt a cast-iron system? This is doubtless the view of the Regulars as to the Volunteers, which must have been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman without sufficient justification. Then as to the question of cost. The right hon. Gentleman has laid before the House the result of what he calls "a searching investigation," and he says that it will be best to put in everything, that "the Volunteers will be indemnified against cost" (which they certainly are not); and the right hon. Gentleman calls it an "approximate estimate," a "normal annual estimate." But no one will be found to defend that estimate now. The right hon. Gentleman began by cutting off all preliminary expenditure applicable to many subjects. There is, for example, the abolition of the Regular adjutant; but I think the House will insist on the retention of the Regular adjutant. The camp allowances are another item. There are many battalions in which the men receive payment at the present time. Some commanding officers can get men for a week without payment, but if they needed their services for a fortnight the men must be paid 4s. or 5s. [Mr. HALDANE dissented.] I have seen the figures embodying the finance of corps, and I assert that my statement is correct. The only doubt is as to what proportion of Volunteer corps payment does or does not exist. Then the statement goes on in these words—

> "It has been assumed that no payment of any kind is to be made for attendance at drill or musketry."

In this statement you do not "indemnify the Volunteers." But the Australian partially-paid system, which is so admirable a success, pays the Volunteer for every moment of his time; if they take him for a portion of the day they pay him for a portion of the day; and that partially-paid system is consistent with perfect self-respect on the part of the Volunteer. He does not look upon himself as a regularly-paid soldier, but as a Volunteer, who simply receives payment for his actual time. The Memorandum goes on to deal with separation allowances, and these are only to be paid to a portion of the non-commissioned officers and none at all to the men; but the men in the Volunteers in many cases require these allowances just as much as the non-commissioned officers. There is no allowance for ammunition to the Artillery or for stores to the Engineers. It has been said that before 1863 the Volunteers were not artisans, but a great many of them were. I myself belonged to a corps, an Engineer corps, after I left the Cambridge University Volunteers—and even before 1863 the War Office were already supplying stores for the Engineers—spades, shovels, and all the stores used in the battalion. The Memorandum distinctly states that there is no allowance of ammunition to the Artillery, or stores to the Engineers. Let me say two or three words more on these figures—illusory figures it seems to me. At this moment there are twenty-three Volunteer adjutants, not Regular soldiers, who are receiving the full pay and allowances of the Regular adjutant. Does the right hon. Gentleman think he will get in the future a man of business, a young attorney, to do the work, or any large portion of the work, now done by the adjutants, for £100 a year? The adjutants now receive pay and allowances which, at the lowest computation, comes to more than £1 a day. This can be tested by the figures of the country as a whole. My right hon. friend was asked what was the number of Regular officers serving as adjutants, and the answer disclosed that the cost worked out at nearly £550 a year on the average. So that it is to my mind idle to suppose that you will get a man of business who will turn out in uniform at all sorts of hours for £100 a year, and be a good man. Then as regards military discipline, it is undoubted that there will be enormous difficulty in the case of the Territorial Army in getting a Volunteer officer to maintain strict discipline over the Regular drill sergeants. The Regular adjutant can do that. I am convinced that my right hon. friend will have to give way upon that question at all events, just as his supporters in the Press have told us he is going to give way on the question of the Yeomanry. There is the question of camps, which my right hon. friend says is vital. If it is vital, and if you are going to train more, I am satisfied that the House of Commons will take the view that you will have to pay more, and that it will not be possible to cut down the allowances in the way proposed. I should like to deal with the matter of garments. It is material to the Estimate which has been laid before the House. My right hon. friend gave an Answer to a Question the other day which I could not for the life of me understand. There was something about 11s. 5d. in it, and I tried to make out what possible garments you could get for that amount. I am relieved from all difficulty on that point by the Answer which the right hon. Gentleman gave to-day that the amount was over £2. The sum is not for a walking out suit or a review suit, but for an ordinary working suit. You forget that the men in camp must have clothes to change into. You must let them have, not only their working suit, but their review suit and walking out suit. Now that matter is under consideration, like a great deal of the finance of this scheme. The Secretary of State for War was asked a Question on the subject on 25th March, and in reply he said—

> "The question as to whether any extra grant is to be made towards the purchase of uniforms for review and walking out purposes is still under consideration."

When pressed further my right hon. friend said—

> "It is clear that the public must provide these people with the clothing necessary."

But there is no money for it in the accounts, and that is another matter on which I am certain the War Office will have to give way. As regards Artillery ammunition, of course reduction was easy if you do not let the Artillery fire. They are at present in that position. The Secretary of State in reply to a Question on 22nd March said—

> "The training of the Artillery Militia will be of an exceptional nature during the present year. There will be no gun practice."

As a Member of this House I have for many years pressed for the creation of a mixed Artillery, as part of the Militia system if you like. I am one of those who believe that you are turning your Garrison Artillery into Field Artillery, and that during the hiatus, which may be a very long hiatus, the Artillery are not to receive ammunition and they are not to fire.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I will not press that point. I believe it is not yet settled. Now as regards ranges. The matter of ranges is left in an extraordinary position in this scheme, and it raises a question which is most interesting to all Volunteers as to how far the War Office are looking forward to putting their hand into the public pocket through the county organisations. Some years ago some of us offered violent opposition to an attempt of the Lord Mayor to raise the cost of the Volunteers by public subscription. We held, and I believe the House of Commons will hold, that this service ought to be paid for by the State and not by private individuals. My hon. friend, who is so conspicuous and so good a Volunteer, asked how far the Volunteers were to be provided for by the Army Council, and how far by private funds. The hon. Gentleman showed how essential the question of ranges was in that respect. Paragraph 13 states—

> "No provision is made for initial expenditure for equipment."

It not only means equipment, but storage for equipment, which is often more costly than equipment itself. Some Volunteer battalions have equipment now, but the majority have not, and you cannot start the Territorial Army without a provision for equipment. You will have to start them at least as well off as the Militia at the present time. I think it is clear that depôt accommodation cannot rest in the position in which it is now, and that will require money. The officer scheme is a matter not only of cost but of principle. The Secretary of State has declared that this is to be a democratic Army, but the method proposed for officering that Army cannot be regarded as satisfactory taken as a whole. Take many of the men who have done the best work—and given the most time—I have in my mind a man who would have made the best officer I have ever met, a literary man of great distinction, but not of large income—the men who have been the real officers of the corps—these men have not been able to accept the position which their talents and labours deserve. Under a democratic scheme you ought to be able to do honour where honour is due. And to do that means money. These men must be relieved of all demands upon their private purse. These things are still in a state of flux. They are still vague in the figures which have been laid before us. At page 12 of the Memorandum issued yesterday you may read—

> "The proposed rates of pay and allowances for officers and men of the Territorial Army have not yet been finally determined; but broadly speaking, it is proposed to pay them, during the training period, at rates based upon the pay and allowances of the corresponding arms and ranks of the Regular Forces, in addition to ration and forage in kind, and to separation allowance for the families of non-commissioned officers. The rates to be paid in aid of the cost of messing will receive special consideration."

Lord Portsmouth in a speech on 21st March said—

> "He was not able at present to state what the amount of the annual bounty would be; that was a question which would be considered in Committee in another place."

That will be an important matter, as my right hon. friend well knows. His supporters in the Press have all told him that it is impossible to run his scheme on the money he estimates it will cost. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but it cannot be done. The military correspondent of The Times, who has always supported his scheme, has said that it would need estimates at the least from £35,000,000 to £40,000,000 sterling a year. And that is without the £21,000,000 which the Secretary of State for India is spending on the Indian Army. It is useless to deceive ourselves on this matter. The Secretary of State for War has told us that the figures might vary, and that the decisions ultimately arrived at might modify the cost. Therefore, the House will not be doing its duty unless it presses the right hon. Gentleman to show precisely what the cost of the scheme will be, and on what scale the scheme is to be carried into effect. As to the representation of the Territorial Army on the Army Council, the right hon. Gentleman was not very clear in the alternative proposals he has put before the House. The absence of sympathy with the Territorial Army on the part of the Army Council is admitted. A Committee of officers presided over by Sir Edward Ward has spoken of "the absence of sympathy on the part of the War Office authorities." How are you going to meet that absence of sympathy? On 25th February the Secretary of State said—

> "Our proposal is that there should be a Committee to represent the interests of the Territorial Army."

Then on 4th March the right hon. Gentleman said that the civil member on the Army Council would have as his chief business in the future representing the county associations. Which was the right proposal?

MR. HALDANE: Both.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: When the right hon. Gentleman was asked who was to be the civil member of the Army Council the answer was: "He is, as a rule, a Peer in the House of Lords." The democratic character of the scheme will not be improved by that, seeing that the officers in the future are to come from the public schools like Eton and Harrow. As regards the Lords-Lieutenants, the Secretary for War desires to restore to them some of that military position which Mr. Cardwell took away. He said that the Lord-Lieutenant would, in future, be a very different person from now. I have no doubt that the only Lord-Lieutenant appointed since the 4th March when that speech was made would be even more military than his predecessors. Those of us who have had experience of Lords-Lieutenant have some doubt as to their ability in military matters. There is one Lord-Lieutenant at this moment whose only military exploit was driving his motor car through a unit of the Regular Army; and when the Commanding Officer spoke to him he said that it was impossible for him to stop the car, and that that was only the second time he had done it! There is very little that is democratic about this Territorial Army. If we are to attract the sympathy of the general public to this national Army it can only be by adopting the Australian plan of paying the artisan classes for all the time they are to give to the public services. Pay them for their loss of wages, and then their patriotism can be counted upon. In conclusion, I wish to say that while I entertain the gravest doubts as to the exact meaning of the scheme, I maintain that the expeditionary force is too large for the needs of the country; as regards the union of the services, I am attracted by it, but even given that union I hold that it cannot be accomplished on the scale suggested without the cost being very much greater than is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War.

MR. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): I agree with much that was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean, but would point out to him that the number of Volunteer corps whose officers pay their men four shillings or five shillings a day, when training, are very few indeed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover made a very interesting speech, and in the course of it he said that the scheme of the Secretary of State for War does not provide "an adequate force for home defence or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field." The right hon. Gentleman has had great experience in Army matters. I remember the time when he was Under-Secretary for War, and I must say that the late Government made a fatal blunder, when the opportunity occurred, in not promoting him to be Secretary for War. If they had done that I feel sure that both the Regular Army and the Auxiliary Forces would have been in a very different position from that in which they are to-day. The right hon. Member for Dover put this dilemma, one of his own creation: You must he said, either (1) deal with your forces as they are, or (2) abolish your present system and adopt a compulsory system of training. That is not the position. Even if the scheme of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War goes by the board, the resources of civilisation are not exhausted. The alternation is not conscription. I maintain that the scheme does provide for an adequate force for Home defence, and also for the prompt support of the Regular Army in the field, and compares favourably with the futile attempts of his two predecessors at the War Office, which have led to such disastrous results in the Volunteer Force. If the scheme of my right hon. friend is not perfect, it at any rate holds the field: and it has this advantage, that it is formed on a voluntary basis. I compliment my right hon. friend on the fact that he has shown no disposition to rush it. He has wisely given the country time to think about it, to digest its details, and has shown himself disposed to consider the opinions of those who have given their services to the State in a voluntary capacity. As the right hon. Gentleman has shown himself to be amenable to reasonable criticism, I hope he will be prepared to modify any details which will not invalidate the underlying principles of his scheme. Approaching the scheme under the conditions of Second Reading limitations, I think that the two line Army plan is a wise one and can be given practical effect to. Perhaps the Secretary for War may not agree with me, but I believe that the proposal for the county associations is not an integral part of his scheme. The second line Army is a grand conception; and it provides a force suited to our needs; but we can provide for that second line Army and yet dispense with the county associations. There has been a good deal of loose talk and muddled thinking in regard to the Auxiliary Forces. We have been told that they are unable to meet the trained troops of Continental nations. Now, if that is so, it is not because the material is bad. The right hon. Member for Croydon, when Secretary of State for War, said in this House that the Volunteers formed the finest material you can find anywhere. It is not that the individual Volunteer is not highly trained. I admit that he is not as efficient as he might be. But that is not the reason why he could not meet foreign troops. The weak point is that the Volunteers have not been organised into larger units. I have not met with a single Volunteer, officer or man who objects to a high standard of efficiency if it does not interfere with the daily employment of the Volunteer. What is the scheme for this new Territorial Army? It is that a force is to be created consisting of fourteen mounted brigades, fourteen divisions of Infantry, with a full complement of cavalry and artillery and coast defence troops. I maintain that all that can be obtained without the interposition of county associations. By his scheme the right hon. Gentleman does not require a larger number of men than we have at present. His aim is that we should have as a second line a self-contained fighting force; that is a great advance on anything which has hitherto been proposed. There is no doubt that the training of that force is a very difficult problem; there must be a certain amount of elasticity, and to combine that with a high standard of efficiency is difficult. But the problem is one which can be solved. However, we must keep in view that these men are civilians, and their training must not interfere with their daily employment in civil life. A good deal has been said about camp training, and I do not undervalue that. Indeed I think my right hon. friend made a sad mistake this year when he abolished the fifteen days training even for one year. I think that will be prejudicial to a certain extent to volunteer efficiency. Although, however, I regard fifteen days training as the minimum which the Volunteers ought to undergo, we must have a certain amount of elasticity, and that is provided for under the Bill in having eight days training for those who are not able to do fifteen days. I remember the scheme of Mr. Brodrick which proved so disastrous to some of our best corps of Volunteers and which introduced compulsory camp training. Some of the best men cannot undergo a period of even eight days training, but these are the men who are very often intellectually and physically much superior to the great run of your Volunteers. An equivalent in drill is provided for them also. Then I have a word to say as to the county associations. I differ from the Secretary of State entirely with regard to the constitution, and in fact with regard to the creation of these bodies. We are in the happy position, however, in having led the Secretary of State for War a considerable way in my direction. I think we have at least arrived at the half-way house. The original idea of these county associations was that we should leave to them the whole control of the Territorial Army, and Lord Esher's Committee recommended that the associations should be entrusted with the entire administration and financial control of the Territorial Force within their area. Now, I hold most strongly that your Territorial Army, if you are going to give it a chance, must be established on a purely military basis. I know the objection that has been urged, and urged with considerable force, that the military man does not understand Volunteers. I think it is true that in the past he has perhaps undervalued the services which the Volunteer has rendered. A great change, however, has taken place in regard to that, and since the South African War there has been a different feeling between the Regular Forces of the Crown and the Auxiliary Forces; but I do agree most heartily with the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, that if you are to have a Territorial Army you must have direct representation on the Army Council. The original scheme of the Esher Committee has not been given effect to, and I admire the alacrity with which my right hon. friend has taken up a sounder strategic position on this point, and I only hope that he will see that these County Associations, having been divested of command and training, are very much in the position of tame white elephants under the training of the General Officers Commanding; the entertainment being arranged and superintended by the Army Council. I most sincerely object to the War Office farming out its responsibilities to these County Associations, and I believe that even now they are to have far too much control. In the last Memorandum but two, I think, which the right hon. Gentleman has issued, that of 25th February, he concluded by saying that financial and administrative arrangements connected with the Territorial Forces were still to be under the Army Council although not conferred by Act of Parliament. I believe that they will be detrimental to the efficiency of the new force. It is a great step in advance that the constitution of these bodies is not to be statutory, that they are to be entirely the creation of the Army Council. Even so, the creation of these bodies will simply be like throwing sand into the gearing of a good machine, because so far as they exercise power they will kill initiative, and so far as they are purely ornamental they will be a delusion and a snare. The position of the Lord-Lieutenant at the present time is not unlike that which he will occupy under this scheme. It is not generally known, but at the present time the appointment to first commissions in the Volunteer Force is not in the hands of the Commanding-Officer; it is under the jurisdiction of the Lord-Lieutenant. A Commanding-Officer cannot appoint a new officer unless he writes to the Lord-Lieutenant of the County and asks him whether he wishes to exercise his right. If he writes back that he waives his right of nomination, than the Commanding-Officer can nominate. That is not generally known. These County Associations, instead of being a help to the scheme of my right hon. friend, which is on the right lines, will be a great disadvantage to it, and I do not wish to see it handicapped by unnecessary weights. Another objection to these County Associations is this—that so far as one can gather from the Bill the Army Council is to make different regulations for different areas. If the Army Council does so, it will be fatal to the efficiency of the force. You will have in many districts of the country merely half-trained troops and a want of uniformity which will make your Territorial Army of very little value. I think that under the scheme of my right hon. friend, the Militia, as we understand it, must go. [An HON. MEMBER: Why?] Well, it is going to be absorbed, and if the hon. Member had listened to the speech of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I think he would have had conclusive evidence that that is so and the reason for it. It is to be absorbed by the special contingent and by the Territorial Army, but I must say that the right hon. Gentleman, so far as his Territorial Army is concerned, must depend upon the Volunteers. That being so, we must critically examine the conditions which he intends to impose upon that force. [Sir HOWARD VINCENT: Hear, hear.] My hon. and gallant friend the Member for Sheffield says "hear, hear," and I look back to the last Parliament, when I moved many Amendments on Volunteer matters and obtained the hearty assistance of my hon. and gallant friend; in fact, he did everything but follow me into the division lobby; that evidently was too great a strain upon his patriotism. I agree with many of the criticisms which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover has made in regard to this scheme, but I think they are not vital criticisms, because I do not think that the House quite realises that at the present time the Volunteer Force is under pretty severe conditions, and with regard to the six months embodiment after war has been declared our position will not be much more onerous than it is at the present time. It has been asserted that the four years engagement will be a serious bar to getting recruits, but at the present time it is three years, and I understand that in some corps the minimum is four years. Then the right hon. Gentleman opposite was very much concerned as to the position of the Yeomanry, but I think he has done that force great injustice. He has said that the Yeomanry will not come forward unless they get 5s. a day; that they are drawn from a class which will not submit to the ordinary pay and rations of the regular soldier. Has the right hon. Gentleman considered that in the Infantry Volunteers at the present time there is a class of men superior so far as social status is concerned to the average yeoman? We have University Companies in some of our battalions, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the members of those companies in camp not only serve for the pay but do fatigue duty more cheerfully than others who ought to be more accustomed to that work. Therefore, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is fair to the Yeomanry in saying that they will not come forward unless they get paid sufficient to give them the luxuries which they would get at home. A man who cannot exist on Army pay and rations is, in my opinion, not worth having. The right hon. Gentleman has been most unfair to that branch of the service, in his difficulty and dilemma in finding arguments against a scheme which he himself must see is a great step in advance. There is one objection that has been made to the scheme by my right hon. friend which I cannot understand, namely, that it will encourage a spirit of militarism. I think it will have entirely the opposite effect. It is in your professional Army, backed up by those who sit at home and shout and do not do any military service, that the danger lies. I have long held the opinion that if you do your own soldiering you will not be so fond of fighting. One can quite understand that those who bear the responsibility are much more careful in looking at the obligation which they have to undertake than those who do not. I am much astonished that from the Labour benches of this House should come an objection to the scheme of my right hon. friend. The Labour Members, in fact, are allying themselves for the moment with the advocates of conscription in opposing this scheme, and I think if they get hold of the idea which I have indicated just now they will find that their support of this second line army is the best bulwark that can be raised, not only against the spirit of militarism, but against compulsory service. I support this scheme because I believe there is an absolute necessity for a reduction in the national expenditure, and I think that, ultimately, this is the most economical way in which we can provide for the military necessities of the country. I do not commit myself to the conservative estimates of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War in regard to the cost of the Territorial Army. I think those estimates are very conservative indeed. This is a scheme which, if it is to be a success, will require a good deal more money than has been indicated by my right hon. friend. But in spite of all that, I think my right hon. friend is going in the direction of economy. It will lead to savings on the Regular forces. He is carrying out the true conception of a small Army suitable for our needs, highly trained, and fully equipped, supported by a much larger body behind it. I support this scheme because I believe it will be a bulwark against compulsory service. I think conscription is not only unnecessary but also entirely unsuited to our needs. I fully concur with what Mr. Cardwell said in this House in 1871, that to enter upon such a course would be distasteful to the country and extremely objectionable from every point of view, but I also join with those who have warned my right hon. friend to be very careful in this matter. I do not think there is any doubt but that the War Office is wedded to conscription. I do not, of course, suggest that they would interfere so as to interpose any obstruction to the success of this scheme, but as my right hon. friend is of a trustful disposition I would ask him to beware of the soldier tactician, because I believe these gentlemen may score off him in regard to the County Associations. If this scheme is carried out on its broad lines it will give us a second line force trained efficiently for home defence. It will also provide a reservoir from which we can draw in time of need. It has been said that we are not a martial nation but that we are a fighting race. That has been proved in every war. In no war in which we have been engaged has there been any lack of men volunteering for service. What we want are trained men who can give their services when called upon. And here let me say that I have always dissented from the views expressed by the Member for Croydon with regard to the Volunteers when the South African war broke out. In my opinion it cannot be too often stated that when that war broke out the Volunteers were prohibited from volunteering for service, and when, eventually, permission was given to them, every obstacle was placed in the way of the response being a success. No battalion was allowed to send a complete company under its own officers, and the whole thing was carried out in such a piecemeal way that the desire of the men to serve their country was stifled. That was felt when the time of stress came and when we sent out at 5s. a day men who had had no training whatever. We must endeavour to keep in touch with the first line. I agree with a great deal that has been said with regard to the necessity of keeping Regular adjutants with the Volunteers. We ought, so far as we possibly can, though the duties of the two forces may be entirely different, to keep them in touch with each other. And I think no better way can be found than to have instructors who are at the moment serving in the first line and who are quite au fait with all the new methods that are adopted and the changes that take place. It is of enormous advantage that there should be this interchange between the two forces. I will conclude my remarks with a quotation from the speech made in this House in 1803 by Mr. Pitt who said—

> "The Army must be the rallying point; the Army must furnish example, must afford instruction, must give us the principles on which that national system of defence must be formed, and by which the Volunteer Forces of this country, though in a military view inferior to a regular Army, would, fighting on their own soil for everything dear to individuals and important to a State, be invincible."

That is as true and applicable to-day as it was a hundred years ago.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): When the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs rose to reply to the speech of my right hon. friend the Member for Dover, I was a little disappointed that we had not had the advantage of hearing the Member of the Army Council who sits beside him. The hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the War Office as a private Member used to have a good deal to say upon these matters, but since he has taken office he has not said one word. He has, I believe, once been allowed to move the adjournment, but he has never made any contribution to these debates. It would have been a great advantage to have heard his defence of the approximate estimates of this proposed scheme. Before I pass to the matter under discussion I must refer to one observation which fell from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The right hon. Gentleman said that every body was asking what the Volunteers were for. That was a most unworthy question to come from a member of the Government. It was not a question put during the black weeks of the South African War, when within a very few weeks the Volunteer force was increased by 50,000 or 60,000; when 30,000 volunteered for service at the front and 25,000 were actually at the front. Since 1875 immense changes have taken place in regard to the Volunteer force. They are always ready to respond to every call the War Office makes upon them, and they have been highly complimented by those with whom they have served. Those compliments have been genuine compliments and not the clap-trap which is so offensive to the best men of the Volunteer corps. There is a Motion down in my name that this Bill shall be read a second time this day six months. That Motion I shall not have an opportunity of moving, but I cordially support the Motion moved by my right hon. friend the Member for Dover who has so much knowledge of the subject and of the War Office. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War will not think I approach this matter in any captious or Party spirit. When my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon was Secretary of State for War he knows perfectly well I did what I could to hinder him from embarking upon what I thought was a dangerous course, and the course I am taking now is entirely dissociated from any Party spirit. I greatly appreciate the enormous trouble that the Secretary of State for War has taken in going about the country and addressing Volunteer corps, distributing prizes and encouraging the corps and their officers. That being so, I am impelled to ask this question. Why does he now seek to abolish the Volunteers as at present constituted? Only the other day the right hon. Gentleman was good enough to publish the example of a battalion of 1,100 strong, and now he seeks to abolish them. If the Secretary of State for War had to deal with a different condition of things, with an entirely new country, if he was a German general forcing a new system on a conquered country, there might be something to be said for his scheme. But is it wise for him to abolish a system which has been in existence for 110 years, and has been established for fifty years on its present basis? Is it wise to abolish the Militia with hundreds of years behind them, and the Yeomanry, and all to obtain a new Territorial Force? I will not go into the question of the Militia which has been already so ably dealt with by my right hon. friend the Member for Dover, or into the question of the Yeomany which will be dealt with by hon. Members far better qualified than I am to deal with it. But is it conceivable, when we hear nothing but praise from the Treasury Bench and from the Front Opposition Bench, and, in the face of the present condition of the Yeomanry, when, we see every regiment full and have the inspecting officers saying they are thoroughly well trained and efficient, that we should abolish all this for the purpose of obtaining a so-called Territorial Force? If this scheme fails, as has been well said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, the re-establishment of the Volunteer Force on its present basis or the Yeomanry or the Militia is impossible, and the only alternative will be conscription or enforced military service. The hon. Member for Merthyr is not in his place, but he made an extremely able speech recently in which he said that if this measure had been proposed by a Conservative Government there would have been the greatest outcry against it by the gentlemen now forming the Government and the Liberal Party. The real fact of the matter is that here young men have an advantage of three or four years over their Continental contemporaries. They can make their plans at the most important moment of their lives without any consideration as to any claim upon them by the country. That is a great advantage. It is proposed to disband the Volunteer forces on their present basis, and I, for one, shall endeavour as far as possible, to prevent those forces from being scattered simply that they may be put under another name and called the Territorial Army. One or two points arise in connection with this matter. Who is the real author of this Bill? The Secretary of State appointed in the spring of last year a Committee of some forty-five members, chosen from highly distinguished officers of the Regular Forces, the general staff of the Militia, the Yeomanry, and well-known officers of Volunteers, together with several eminent civilians. That Committee met seven or eight times, and they gave a sort of general approval to some printed document laid before them concerning Lords-Lieutenant and county associations. The Territorial Army Committee was the name given to it by the Secretary of State, and Lord Esher was appointed Chairman. But since that time the Committee has never been summoned at all. On the 17th October, each member received a circular, which was not marked confidential, saying that the Secretary of State was engaged in the consideration of several important matters, but he hoped soon to summon the Committee again to confer with them. From that day to this, no member of the Committee has ever had any summons at all, or has ever heard anything whatever of this Territorial Force. That is most unlike the Secretary of State for War, who is courtesy itself. The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean spoke of the right hon. Gentleman's great capacity for enlisting the sympathies of all persons with whom he came in contact. I will not attribute to the right hon. Gentleman the Biblical character given to him by the right hon. Baronet. At any rate, all who have had any dealings with him know that he is one of the most courteous of individuals, and that he is most anxious to do everything in an agreeable way. Therefore, I think the treatment of the Territorial Army Committee is one of the most inexplicable things I have ever heard of. The only suggestion I can make is, that the right hon. Gentleman saw that his Bill would never be approved, would never be endorsed or sanctioned by the Territorial Army Committee, and that he would be in possession of so many minority reports that it would be quite impossible to produce this Bill before the House of Commons. [AN HON. MEMBER: The Duma was dissolved.] My hon. friend says that the Duma was dissolved, but this Committee has never been even dissolved, and we have never had even a farewell speech or farewell benediction from the right hon. Gentleman. However that may be, the House will at any rate distinctly understand that the Territorial Army Committee, appointed to assist the Secretary of State, has no part or parcel in the shaping or forming of this Bill, the Second Reading of which is now under consideration. Then the question arises, who is the author of the Bill? I suppose the Secretary of State will say the Army Council. The Army Council is responsible for the Bill, and, therefore, we have to consider who are the Army Council. The head and front of the Army Council is the Secretary of State for War himself. Then we have the Financial Secretary, who was so communicative of brilliant ideas in this House, and who is now so silent. Then there is the Under-Secretary for War, the Earl of Portsmouth. I can hardly think, with all my admiration for the many qualities of Lord Portsmouth, that he is a modern Napoleon, and that he is the real author of this Bill. Then we come to the military members. First of all, we have an officer of enormous ability in General Hadden who has only just been appointed, and has had no experience whatever of the Auxiliary Forces. Therefore, he can have had very little share in the framing of the Bill. Then there are other two generals. The time of one has been fully occupied in organising the new General Staff, while the other has rendered brilliant service in India; and there is the Adjutant-General, General Douglas. I admit that General Douglas has a full knowledge of Volunteers, both in peace and in war. He was Adjutant for some time of the London Scottish, and he rendered very great service in that capacity. But I ask the Secretary of State for War very distinctly, has he received a Minute from General Douglas recommending him to disband the Volunteers as such? Secondly, has he recommended him to disband the Adjutants, of whom he was such a brilliant example, and who have done so much to keep the best corps up to the highest mark of efficiency? Has the Adjutant-General, in his Minute, recommended the Secretary for War to dispose of the property of the Volunteer forces, of lands and cash and so on, without any compensation, to the county associations? And, lastly, I ask him, has General Douglas, the Adjutant-General, with his knowledge of Volunteers, laid before the Secretary of State any Minute that under the Territorial Reserve Forces Scheme the men will be forthcoming? If he has, I would ask him to lay that Minute on the table; he ought to read it to the House. Now, there are one or two points of detail in connection with the Bill to which I should wish more particularly to refer. My principal objection to it is, that here we have, at the present time, an Auxiliary Force of 374,000 men, in round numbers—Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers. We have a war establishment of 503,000. I agree entirely with the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean that there is no disadvantage whatever in a disproportion between the actual strength of a force and its establishment strength; because it allows the force to be readily expanded without any public parade, and without any consent of Parliament—without calling Parliament together, without the Government being called upon to give any explanation which might cause offence to some foreign Power, and precipitate the very warlike operations which you are anxious to avoid by timely preparation. I think, therefore, that there is very great advantage in having a large military establishment, and a considerable margin between it and the actual strength. What does the Secretary of State propose to do? He proposes to remove this force of 503,000 men and to substitute for it a possible force of 300,000 men. He has now 374,000 men in the Auxiliary Forces, and he thinks if he gets all he asks for that he will obtain 300,000 men. On that ground alone his scheme is one which I think should not be proceeded with. But how is he going to get his 300,000 men under the new system? Some parts of his scheme are good, but I will not touch upon them. I think the scheme for the special contingents and the special reserves to be a good thing. I do not know whether it will answer or not, but I do not see any reason why it should not be tried, while keeping the Militia and Volunteers just as they are at present. There is no occasion, in order to try it, to disband the forces we have now. Whether it will succeed or not I do not know; but we had an experimental company last year, and from my own knowledge of what can be done in six months, I think it is very likely that it would be successful if the men were forthcoming. Neither the Secretary of State, however, nor I, nor anybody in this House, can tell in the least whether the men will be forthcoming or whether they will not. Still, I am perfectly willing that the plan should be tried. There is not the slightest need, however, to abolish the present Auxiliary Forces in order to attain that end. What ground is there for supposing, having disbanded the Militia, the Yeomanry and Volunteers, that a sufficient number of men will be forthcoming to form the force of 300,000 under the much more stringent conditions which the right hon. Gentleman proposes? Now as to the explanation which he owes to this House. It is not enough for him to say, "I think they will be forthcoming;" what is his ground for thinking it, and what reliable sources of information will he be able to lay before the House on the subject? Another point which I think of importance in connection with this scheme is the matter of the county associations. The county associations, to be a success and to attract good men, must have a free hand. But at every step the county association is to be under the guidance of the Army Council; as the Bill states, it cannot do anything really practical without the consent of that body. That being the case, I think that it would be extremely difficult to have satisfactory working by the county associations. This idea of county associations is not a new thing; it is not the idea of the Secretary of State at all; it is the idea of Elizabeth, it is the idea of Cromwell. If I remember aright, one of the great recommendations of this scheme to the Committee was that it was the idea of Cromwell, and that they were only re-establishing what Cromwell had done with a certain measure of success. Therefore, I will not quarrel with the county associations, but I do ask the right hon. Gentleman—and in Committee I shall do all I can to secure that he gives it—that the county associations shall have a much freer hand than is provided for in the Bill. The Secretary of State made a speech the other day—he has made many speeches, but he made one the other day in which he said that when he came to the War Office he found everything in a most confused state, and that everything was centralised in the Department. All I can say is that I have commanded different battalions of Volunteers for twenty-three years, and I have never found the slightest difficulty of any sort or kind. I have never had to ask the Government for a single sixpence of loan. But under this scheme nothing whatever is to be done without the formal approval of these county associations. That is sacrificing some of our best administrative ability and throwing it into the melting pot. I do not want to go at any great length into the details of the Bill, but there are one or two matters to which I should like to draw special attention. The first point I wish to raise is in regard to the legal proceedings. I desire to know what guarantee the right hon. Gentleman has that the men will be forthcoming for the Territorial Force after they have been dismissed from the Volunteers. The clauses dealing with legal proceedings are of extremely drastic character. Clause 23 lays down that—

> "Any offence under this part of this Act, and any offence under the Army Act, if committed by a man of the Territorial Force when not embodied, which is cognisable by a court martial shall be cognisable by a court of summary jurisdiction, and on conviction by such a court shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or with a fine not exceeding £20, or with both such imprisonment and fine; but nothing in this provision shall affect the liability of a person charged with any such offence to be taken into military custody."

Is that one of the attractions which the Secretary of State for War holds out to the present Volunteers to join this new Territorial Force? Clause 24 is also a most extraordinary one. It provides that—

> "An officer or man charged with an offence which under this part of this Act is cognisable both by a court martial and by a court of summary jurisdiction shall not be tried by both of those Courts."

That is lucky. Then the clause proceeds—

> "Provided that a man who has been dealt with summarily by his commanding officer shall be deemed to have been tried by court martial."

Who ever heard of such a provision as that? A man whose omnibus is late or whose train has been delayed by the fog——

MR. HALDANE: My hon. and gallant friend is under a slight misapprehension. That does not apply to a time of peace.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: But if the right hon. Gentleman will kindly read his own Bill, on page 16 he will find that it applies to "any offence under the Army Act if committed by a man of the Territorial Force when not embodied."

MR. HALDANE: It only applies in case of embodiment.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Then is there going to be a court of summary jurisdiction to travel about with the Army in the field? Is there going to be a stipendiary magistrate attached to every corp under this new Territorial Force? Is this the attraction the Secretary of State for War is holding out for the Volunteers to join his new force? The present expense of the Auxiliary Force is, in round figures, about £4,400,000, and the Secretary of State for War claims that he will be able to procure his new force for £2,800,000. But how does he arrive at this conclusion? First of all he cuts down his 78,000 men to 74,000, but he takes no account whatever of his fourteen divisional generals, or the guns, rifles, or equipment which they will require. He takes no account whatever of capital expenditure which will be necessary on drill halls and ranges and other details. There is no provision at all for review or walking-out uniforms, which I feel certain will be absolutely necessary. Lastly, there is no account whatever taken of non-effective charges, or cadets, or rifle clubs. So far from the new Territorial Force being more economical, I am afraid it will be quite the reverse. The hon. Member for East Edinburgh has told the House that if this scheme is to be a success it will cost a great deal more, and when the right hon. Gentleman hears the statement from such an authoritative quarter, I think he ought to attach great weight to it. I feel sure that instead of being more economical it will be far more expensive than the present system. Now I come to Clause 28, Sub-section (b), which provides—

> "For transferring to the association any property vested in a Secretary of State for the purpose of any unit to which the Order relates."

I think that is an appropriation of private property which this House will never sanction, and which it ought not to sanction. The affairs of the Volunteers have in the past been administered with the greatest care; the Force have acquired considerable property by their own funds and by subscriptions from their friends and members, and now all this property is to be taken away from those corps which have administered their affairs so well, and is to go into the hotch-potch for the benefit of the county association. If the right hon. Gentleman wants an instance I only need mention the case of the Queen's Westminsters. Although the property of the corps has suffered considerable depreciation, the latest valuation puts it at about £14,000 in property and cash. The corps does not owe a single sixpence to the Government. Its only debt consists of a small sum due to an insurance company which the corps has tried to pay off, but the company will not accept the money, because they consider it a good business investment. Is all this property, and are all these ranges, drill halls, and cash, to be taken away from them, although their affairs have been well administered, and handed over without their consent to the county association? I think this is one of the most extraordinary proposals dealing with the property of a Volunteer corps which has ever emanated from any Government. I hope, however, that the Secretary of State for War will not think I am at all anxious to thwart him in his efforts to improve the efficiency of the Auxiliary Forces. I hope I have shown during a somewhat prolonged service that that is not my desire. There are some commanding officers I know who think that this Territorial Force will have a better status than the present Volunteer Force, but I very much doubt if those gentlemen have read the whole of the provisions of this Bill. There are thirty-eight clauses and innumerable sub-clauses, orders of the Army Council and rules which can be made subject to their being laid upon the Table of the House "as soon as may be." Hon. Members know that the laying of orders and rules on the Table is a very infinitesimal protection, because few people know they are there, and the Government has sole charge of the time of the House. Consequently it is almost impossible for any hon. Member to get an opportunity of calling attention to rules so laid. There are some good points in the Bill, but as regards the Volunteer Force, I think it is not a scheme which ought to go through. I disagree entirely with those who say that the scheme ought to be given a trial, because if it should happen to fail there is nothing before us but conscription, and I will do everything I can to prevent conscription from being forced upon this country. In the past the Volunteer Force has saved us from conscription. I know that at the present time there is a formidable party urging conscription, and almost the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's advisers are in favour of it, because they see that after the failure of this Bill conscription is an absolute certainty in the near future. For these reasons I support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover, and if the Second Reading is carried I shall do all I can to amend the measure in Committee so as to avoid some of the deterrent influences which I feel will prevent this scheme's being a success.

*MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): I will not follow my hon. and gallant friend into the details which he has laid before the House, although the statement he has made is of great weight and interest, because I think it will probably be much better to reserve such criticisms till we reach the Committee stage. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover has made out his case for rejecting this Bill on the ground that it will provide neither an adequate force for home defence, nor a proper support for the Regular Army in the field. What does this Bill really set out to do? What is the change that it makes? I do not think there is any real change in calling things by new names; therefore I approach this subject from a totally different point of view from most people, because I see no fundamental difference in the Territorial Force which is to be constituted, and the present Volunteers, the Yeomanry, and the Militia. What does this Bill do with the new force? It at least gives the Auxiliary Forces something which the present force lacks, and which I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover must admit are absolutely essential for any force taking the field, viz.:—cohesion and mobile artillery. This is an entirely new proposal and will make an entirely new force in this country. Hitherto we have had our Regular Army for service abroad and for the defence of this country. Practically we have had a school of arms in the Auxiliary Forces, but in no sense whatever have we had an Army. I support my right hon. friend entirely on these points, although I differ from his proposals in so far as they involve the retention of such a great number of Regular troops in this country. I support him in creating a Home Army, because after all this is the crux of the whole matter, and I am convinced that only by this method can we have security and at the same time effect a reduction of the military forces of the Crown. I must say that I only urge a reduction in the Regular troops because I am firmly convinced that unless we reduce their number, public opinion will force us to reduce the Navy, and that would involve complete and utter disaster. Why does the right hon. Gentleman propose to have so many as 167,000 men for his expeditionary force? Even the Leader of the Opposition has told us that such a force is not required for anything except a Continental enterprise which he doubts the wisdom of providing for. I think the real reason why this number is provided is because the men are there for the purposes of the Cardwell system, and as they are there he rightly thinks they ought to be organised into something useful. When we have asked, as I have ventured to ask frequently, supported always by my right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean and many younger Members, for a reduction of this force, we have always been met by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I believe by every conspicuous Member of the Opposition and by some Members on this side of the House, with the statement that you cannot leave this country bereft of defence, and that you cannot rely wholly on the Navy. I agree, and I say that we cannot rely on the Volunteers because they are in no sense an Army. I think if we looked to a country where they have created an auxiliary army we might see what a great economy we might effect in this country by doing the same thing. A few months ago by the courtesy of the Swiss Government I was enabled to view the Swiss manœuvres. I was in a company of officers from almost every European army. That army has a training longer than our own Auxiliary Forces, but not very much so—six weeks originally for the infantry and sixteen days every alternate year. Is that army in point of fact a success? It is quite extraordinary the efficiency to which that army has attained. Every officer of the Continental armies who was present—officers who were naturally somewhat hostile to the idea of the success of an army so different from their own—testified to the extraordinary success of that army. It is in the one particular which our Auxiliary Forces now lack, namely, artillery, that they so greatly excel. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition threw some doubt during the last debate on an assertion of mine that it was possible to make an effective Volunteer field artillery. I think the answer would be "Look at the Swiss army. Their drivers are excellent and their practice is beyond all praise." Of course it is true that a portion of this artillery is composed both of officers and non-commissioned officers who have had a longer training and that that would be the case under the scheme of my right hon. friend. Well, you may say "But would an army like the Swiss army, if we had it here, serve actually to both prevent the danger of invasion and to calm the public mind?" The answer might be, "It would not, because it is not proposed to give it the same length of training." But surely those critics have forgotten this. If it be true that the value of a soldier depends on the length of his training it must also be true that the troops of any possible invader are inferior to our own Regular troops at home, or inferior to the 130,000 Regular troops at present in this country. Directly there is the least prospect of these Regular troops being sent out of the country, this Army with transport, and artillery would be embodied and would be able to pile up that training which is considered so essential. And if it be remembered that it is most unlikely that we should embark 160,000 with all their provisions, stores, and artillery, until at least six weeks have elapsed, it will be seen that before the danger of invasion has to be met by the Territorial Force it will have piled up the six weeks service given in the Swiss army which is admittedly such an extraordinary success. Two hon. Members opposite have whispered the word "compulsory." They say that the Swiss army is a success because it is based upon compulsory service. It must be admitted that compulsion is wholly bad from the military point of view if you can get the men by voluntary service. The problem of war, and especially modern war, is to get men with hearts in the job who will avoid the temptation, the almost overwhelming temptation, to surrender in the moment of supreme danger which supervenes at an early stage in modern battle, and if therefore by the principle of voluntary service you can eliminate from the Army even in peace time the people who do not want to fight and still keep the requisite number of men, it is clear that you will be more formidable than if you force into the ranks the willing and the unwilling. Under your voluntary system you eliminate even in peace time the man who is determined not to fight. That is a very great asset, and if any hon. Member reads Sir Ian Hamilton's second volume he will find that the same thing is stated by more than one Japanese officer, though in different terms. There is no advantage under compulsion by itself. The selfish loafer may possibly be advantaged by serving in your Army. On that, I express no opinion. But it is certainly bad for the Army to have loafers, and if you can eliminate them by voluntary service so much the better. If you fix the number of men at 300,000, I should say that the odds are that you can, because, as has been pointed out, we have 374,000 men in the Auxiliary Forces at somewhat similar rates of pay and allowances under similar advantages and obligations to those proposed by this scheme. If there are differences they can be amended in Committee. If you get 374,000 men to serve in the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers, on the strictly voluntary principle, and if you get them to give a week or a fortnight in the case of the Volunteers, a month in the case of the Militia, and eighteen days in the case of the Yeomanry—and above all let it be remembered that you have drills all through the year, attendance at lectures, and staff rides—if you get all that under the voluntary system, and if you will only give the force artillery, without which it must be defeated, but with which it can fight on equal terms with any foe, you can certainly expect to get the numbers for the proposed new force under the voluntary system, and after six weeks it must be a useful force unless you are to assume that Englishmen are less apt than the Swiss for military service. I support the right hon. Gentleman in endeavouring to set it up, believing that it is essential and that in the long run it will lead to great economy. I agree with the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean and others that it cannot be done for the sum which the Secretary of State for War suggests. It is not a matter, it seems to me, of very great substance, for if you can get complete security in the public mind, and enable yourself, therefore, to reduce your Regular Army to such a size that you could give the soldier the same advantage of employment in after life as you give to-day to the sailor, the spending of a million or two would be worth while for the advantage of the Army, and from the financial point of view for the advantage of the State. I do not think it can be done for the money, and I will tell the right hon. Gentleman why. I shall instance the Yeomanry, having served for eighteen years in that force. The right hon. Gentleman wishes the Yeomanry to serve at the rate of 1s. 5d., and everyone sympathises with his desire that all branches of the Territorial Army should be approximately on the same level. It is not money that makes them serve; it is in most cases laudable motives of patriotism. But in point of fact horse soldiers cannot be obtained in any country at a small rate. My right hon. friend will naturally think of the Swiss army, since the cavalry receive approximately the same pay and allowances as in other armies. He may think that that is an argument on his own side, but really I think it is against him, for the Swiss soldier receives far more than our Yeoman gets to-day. He gets a horse from the Government by paying instalments at such a small rate that he gets undoubtedly far more than our Yeoman to-day. I must say he is a most gallant person who is prepared to ride a perfectly strange horse over a mole-hilly field, with a gun in one hand. My right hon. friend might give his attention to the subject of horses and he might adopt a similar method to the Swiss. It will not be cheaper; it will be more expensive than the present plan, but the advantages to the Army will be so great as fully to compensate for its adoption. What would be the changes in the three different branches? In the case of the Militia, they will become, I hope, part of the Territorial Army. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover based most of his opposition on the Militia point of view. The Duke of Bedford has denounced the Government for destroying the Militia, and rightly pointed out that the Militia did good service in the South African War. That was because they were Englishmen and not because they were Militiamen. The Militia is unsuited to our industrial needs except in some parts. In some parts of Scotland fishermen might spare the month required for training and still remain useful members of civil society. In Durham, and in some parts on the borders, there were certain miners who could well afford to spend a month in training and still remain useful members of civil society. But with those exceptions it is immensely difficult for any man—and I challenge contradiction—to serve in the Militia and still remain a useful member of the civil community. He cannot possibly spare a month every year. The man who succeeds in peace is the man who succeeds in war, and if you want to fight battles effectively, you must use the best and not the worst of the population. It is useless to have a Territorial Army on a basis which will debar the most useful members of society from belonging to it. Reform the Militia, if you must, by altering the terms of service. Our new territorial force is accordingly to serve for that period, and the Volunteers will take on the obligation which the Militia have to-day, while the Militia will take on the period of training of the Volunteers. I cannot see where there is any need for alarm. A fortnight's camp has always been successful; but experience has shown that the men cannot go into camp for a month. This scheme has been attacked by two schools of thought—by those like Lord Roberts and Lord Milner, who believe that no scheme not based on compulsion will be adequate for the defence of this country and the Empire. For my own part, I venture to say that compulsory service for home defence would imperil and weaken our Imperial position. Of course if any one were to come here and propose compulsory service for oversea garrisons or conscription for service on the Indian frontier his proposal would be entitled to respect as a solution of the real problem that faces us, although I would oppose him on the grounds that it would be a gross interference with the liberty of Englishmen; but conscription for home defence only would be a hindrance, not a help, to our oversea obligations. We have to send 17,000 to 20,000 men across the sea every year in time of peace, and as many as 400,000 in time of war; but France and Germany who have compulsory service have not to send a tithe of the men we have to send across the sea. Look at the difficulty that France had in despatching troops to Madagascar and even to Algeria. I have read much literature on the subject, and I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that France, with compulsory service, appears to find more difficulty in sending 5,000 men across the sea than we find in sending 50,000. So it is with Germany. The difficulty in getting a sufficient number of men to volunteer for warlike operations in South West Africa caused the German Government the gravest embarrassment; and the difficulty of maintaining their quota of the International Expedition for the relief of the legations at Pekin was considerable. I suppose that the explanation is to be found in the tendency of compulsory service of any kind to sap the spirit of self-sacrifice. That has been the effect in France and Germany, and it was the effect in this country a hundred years ago. I see the right hon. Gentleman opposite raises his eyebrows; but we had compulsory service for home defence a hundred years ago; and if he reads history he will find that compulsory service for home defence prevented young fellows from volunteering for foreign service abroad. It is most essential to have a force which will make invasion of this country impossible, but I believe that compulsory service for home defence, far from being an advantage, would be a disadvantage. It has been said that the scheme of the Secretary of State for War is un-democratic and anti-democratic. So far as it is both, I would oppose it. I am not a Lord-Lieutenant's man in this matter. I think the Lords-Lieutenant should be elected by their fellows, but that after all is a detail. The truth is that the Auxiliary Army has never got on with the War Office, and by the means of the county associations you do provide some kind of buffer between the Auxiliary Army and the War Office. I do not contend that the scheme is perfect; I do not think that the county associations, as it is proposed to create them, will take all the interest in the Territorial Army which might be desired; but I think a step is being taken in the right direction, a democratic direction. Then, as to the officers of the force, I agree with the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, that in this matter our Army is the least democratic of all European armies. In all other armies, even in Prussia, some considerable proportion of the Army officers first serve in the ranks, and rise by promotion. All officers pass through the ranks in the case of Switzerland. That system is good for the officers, and also good for the men. I hope that after the Territorial Army has been created we shall adopt the truly democratic principle of making all men begin at the bottom and serve through all ranks, obtaining their promotion by proficiency, the system which acts so admirably in Switzerland. I recognise that the right hon. the Secretary of State for War may say that he cannot overload his Bill with such details; but I maintain that his scheme will never be a great success unless it is founded on a democratic basis. I do not for a moment suppose that any Member of the House approves of every clause in the Bill, but a Second Reading should be given to it. I believe that the people of this country are sick to death at the perpetual disputes between politicians and soldiers, and they are anxiously waiting for a plan for the settlement of this great problem, and if that plan appeals to them there is no limit to the sacrifice that they will make for the defence of this country and the Empire.

*VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) said that he agreed to a certain extent with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Abercromby Division that if this scheme were carried to its maturity it would provide for the security of our country; but it would take four or five years experience to determine if it was sufficient or not. He hoped the Bill, when threshed out in Committee, would be made a workable and good measure; and that it would render our position as a nation even more unassailable than he believed it to be at the present time. He could not say that hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches approached this Bill in a Party spirit. The question which interested them was whether the scheme would fulfil the hopes of its originators. He himself was too deeply interested in the Army to care from which political Party an Army scheme emanated, so long as it improved the Army. He recognised the great boon which such a scheme as that now before the House would confer on the country if it could be got into real good working order; but he believed that under present conditions it was impossible to provide a force of 300,000 men in the way proposed. He ventured to think that the Foreign Secretary attached too much importance to what he called public or patriotic spirit. The public spirit which was shown in face of a definite danger to a certain extent became dormant when the question was only one of preparation against danger. He did not deny that patriotic spirit would be found to be existent when a definite danger had to be faced, but the spirit lay dormant when the question was preparation against a possible danger. If he were convinced that the scheme was for the education of the male population and would enforce upon them the idea that it was the first duty of everyone to take some part in the national defence of the country, and that it was only by a stroke of luck that he was not called upon to act in that capacity, he would give the scheme his hearty support. But he did not believe that that would be the result. That could only come about from a scheme of universal service known by the name of conscription, and he had no desire that day to dilate on the many reasons for and against that system. In his opinion the Bill depended too much upon the idea that the incentive to join the Army and the Auxiliary Forces had been self-sacrifice—the idea of doing something patriotic. He did not believe that that had been the idea, and he did not believe that it ever would be. He might claim, he thought, a small experience both in the Volunteers and in the Regular Army, and he could only say from personal experience that the incentive to join the Regular force certainly was not the patriotic spirit, to a great extent at all events, but various exigencies of gaining some livelihood. With regard to the Auxiliary Forces, however, it was to some extent different. A number joined, it was true, from a patriotic spirit, but he believed the majority joined because their friends belonged to the Volunteers, because to join was considered a good thing to do, and because members of the force had uniforms in which it was possible for them to walk out when not engaged in military duties. When the conditions were made harder, as they would be in almost every case, and to a certain extent less remunerative, he could not see how a force of 300,000 men was going to be evolved at the call of the Secretary for War. It was obvious that the scheme abolished the Militia, and he was at a loss to understand how it was possible for the Yeomanry to survive when the conditions under which they were called upon to serve were made harder and the remuneration smaller. With regard to the great bulk of the Yeomanry he did not believe that it was possible for men to give up their employment unless they received some adequate remuneration for the trouble and loss of employment which they incurred. As regarded the county associations he admitted that at first sight it was a very attractive scheme that those connected with the soil and employers of labour should be called upon to undertake the duty of collecting a territorial force in the county in which they resided. But on consideration it became obvious that the county associations meant the establishment of forty or fifty War Offices, each with a Budget, clerks, comptrollers, and a paid staff which would be suitable for the expenditure of something like a hundred thousand pounds. He was ready to admit that the Lords-Lieutenant and the authorities of the various counties would make a most excellent advisory body, but he did not see how they could as an administrative body be looked upon as rendering efficient service. If the county associations were to carry out the duties which the Bill proposed it would be necessary for the Secretary for War to make a reduction of the War Office Vote, and also of the staff regulating the affairs connected with the Auxiliary Forces. He would certainly suggest that the local interest should be enlisted by having an advisory body for the purpose of assisting the general officer commanding. With regard to the amounts of money that the local associations would ask from the Army Council, he did not understand how it would be possible for those associations to realise their exact position in regard to expenditure. He did not understand how under that head there could be any uniformity whatever. He viewed with apprehension the authority granted to local bodies for the purpose of borrowing money, for it appeared to him that that could only be looked upon as a municipalisation of those associations. The duties of the county associations would be so manifold that the question that arose in his mind was as to whether it was proposed that the machinery of those local associations should be supported by local effort, or whether the expenses they incurred in arranging the various details, such as rifle clubs and cadet corps, should be defrayed by the War Office. [Mr. HALDANE was understood to assent.] He was glad he had cleared up one point. He thought that the county associations would have their hands very full and that they would have ample work in regard to the rifle and cadet corps in the counties to which they belonged. There was no denying that rifle corps and cadet corps were two of the most important items of national defence. He noticed that there was no regulation in the Bill in regard to the preliminary training of the Territorial Army. At the present moment the Militia training was laid down by Act of Parliament, but it might, under this scheme, by an Order in Council, be extended to thirty days. He thought that if the matter was left to the Army Council to decide, such a course would dissuade a great many from joining the force. The artillery was one of the most important branches of our offensive and defensive forces, but there had been no mention of the large number of men — 10,000—who were to form part of the striking force, and to be artillerymen trained on a Militia basis. He would like to ask whether they came under the Bill, and before the Bill went to the Committee stage he thought they should have a definite answer to that question With regard to mobilisation, the two most important considerations were with regard to artillery and officers, and it was obvious that neither of those two could be improvised at a moment's notice. No special arrangements appeared to have been made with regard to artillery, however, in spite of the example which was being set us by foreign nations in developing that arm. As to the officers, at the present moment he thought the Militia was short by 1,000 and the Volunteers by some 1,500. On mobilisation, also, the Army would require an additional 2,000, although the War Office had just reduced their strength by 400. That did not seem to show that they attached special importance to the question of officers. It was also proposed to absorb the present class of Militia officers into the third battalion. The question naturally arose how officers were to be obtained for the Territorial Army, and it seemed to him that there would be very great difficulty. The pay granted to the Yeomanry had been reduced, and that fact was bound to reduce the number of officers in that force. Then again, the conditions of service were made more onerous. The terms under which the Volunteers served were also more exacting, and there was an obligation to serve six months on mobilisation, which would certainly prevent many officers from joining who otherwise would have done so. If we were not to have compulsory service, there was only one alternative by which officers could be obtained, and that was by giving them additional payment. It was no use, to his mind, depending upon the so-called public spirit and patriotism, because people nowadays could not afford to be patriotic, and if we wanted officers we must pay them to enable them to obtain the military education which was essential to all officers in our military and Reserve forces. He thought some thing could be done by subsidising men who at present had not the time to enter the service. He believed the Bill would press more harshly upon the Yeomanry than upon any other portion of our Auxiliary Forces, and that was to be regretted when it was remembered that that force was reorganised in 1901 and was now in a satisfactory position, having risen since that time from 9,000 to 27,000. That clearly showed the benefit of the step then taken. At the present moment the ranks were full, officers were plentiful,and, what was better still, the inspection reports sent in by officers of the Regular Army were in nearly all cases favourable. To reduce that force to the level of the Volunteers, which appeared to be part of the scheme, would bring it back to the condition it was in before 1901. To his mind the importance of that point might be lost sight of in view of the general havoc which provisions of the Bill would enact, but it should be realised that at the present moment we had no actual reserve for our cavalry. It appeared to him to be folly to attempt to carry out a scheme which would destroy a thoroughly efficient force, which had certainly some claims to the consideration of the House, not the smallest of which was the liability to serve abroad. A further claim was its past service, which it was not for the House to ignore, and which, if they did ignore, they would find cause to regret. He had no desire to detain the House further. As he had said, if they could wake up one morning and find this scheme in thorough working order it might afford that security to the country which all thought most necessary, and for which they looked to some scheme to provide. But there was something else to be looked at, and he feared the Government were destroying the substance for a shadow. If the Bill passed its Second Reading, he could only say that Amendments would have to be moved for the purpose of ameliorating the conditions of the forces and preventing the present Auxiliary Forces from being starved out of existence.

*SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham) said the speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down only emphasised the observation he desired to make, that he deplored the fact that the Opposition had thought fit to move an Amendment which, if carried, would have the effect of rejecting the scheme of his right hon. friend. Having had an opportunity during the Easter recess of perusing and considering the Bill, he had come to the conclusion that both in scope and in principle it was wisely conceived. It was incontestably a great advance on any previous scheme, and it now only required the uniform and united patriotism of all classes of the community to realise as its result reasonable machinery for a military organisation to meet the needs of the nation and the Empire. As his right hon. friend had pointed out on a previous occasion, the Bill aimed at creating machinery to fulfil four purposes. The first two were embodied in the scheme for the Territorial Army, the first in the constitution of the county associations and the second in the constitution of the force itself. The other two purposes were the creation of a more reliable and expanding Reserve for the Regular Army. The chief charges made against the scheme of his right hon. friend had been more with regard to the portion of the scheme which dealt with the Reserve than to any other portion. The House had been told that the right hon. Gentleman was going to abolish the Militia. As he read the scheme his right hon. friend was going to do nothing of the sort. He was not going to abolish the Militia in any sense or form, but by his scheme was going to afford an opportunity to the force to transfer itself, both in its character and in its traditions, to the Territorial Army under such conditions that those who continued in that force could continue their civil life also.

At the same time the scheme proposed to raise all arms of the Territorial Force to the standard of discipline of the transferred Militia. He ventured, therefore, to make an appeal to those who were officers of the Militia, and who, therefore, had influence not only in their own battalions but in the whole Militia movement throughout the country, to enter into the spirit of the scheme with the same patriotic spirit which animated the proposals of his right hon. friend. If that were done he was certain the Militia cadres would transfer themselves in the manner in which his right hon. friend suggested. As he understood, the only difference would be that the duties the transferred Militia would be asked to perform in time of peace would be less onerous and more compatible with the conditions of civil life of the professional men engaged, while the same liabilities in time of war would be shared by all members of the Territorial Army. Nobody would deny that the Militia had, through no fault of its own, deteriorated in recent years. It had been the victim of a haphazard system of recruiting for the Regular Army. It had been bled for years for recruits for the Regular Army, and in later years it had found in the Volunteer force a successful rival in its recruiting area. The Militia for some years had been in the habit of providing approximately something like 12,000 men annually for the Regular Army. Those recruits had joined the Militia and had been enrolled as on the establishment, but in the majority of cases they had never been attached to a Militia regiment, but had been removed straight from the depot where they had been drilled as recruits, and had joined their battalion of the Regulars either at home or abroad. The Regulars would in no way suffer from this scheme, because the 12,000 men would be available from the new body known as the special contingent which would supply men ranging from 180 to 600 in number, who would have been drilled for six months under competent officers previous to their entering into civil occupation, and would then be enrolled in a Reserve for six years, during which time they would be liable to be called up in time of war, and periodically at the discretion of the Army Council. It would produce a Reserve to meet the necessities of the Army, a Reserve which approximated 70,000 or 80,000, and those, together with the Regular Reserve of the Army which would be drawn from the time-expired men, would give the Army a Reserve for mobilisation, and for filling up the ranks during the first six months of war. In previous years we had had a seven years service, but we had never had a separate establishment to secure this extra Reserve to come behind the time-expired men. Then we had had a three years service which gave a very large Reserve, but which had to be abandoned, because it could not economically fill up the necessary drafts. It was argued that the new Reservists would not be sufficiently efficient in their training to meet other trained troops in the field. But it must be remembered that the men from the special contingents would not be asked to go into the ranks at the outbreak of war, but would be trained for four months on the outbreak of war and would then be drafted into the depleted ranks. The scheme was capable of very large expansion in times of great national emergency. There would be a greater number of depots for training purposes, and in times of great national emergency there would be no limit to those who might go into training in those depots. That could not be done under the present system of the Militia, except by asking for a Reserve consisting of units. All that the Militia battalions could do in times of national emergency under the present law was to volunteer as units to serve at the front. All modern scientific opinion was on his side when he said that a draft, however little trained, was far preferable for fighting purposes to an ill-trained unit. All experience bore that out. In the Russo-Japanese War the Japanese relied entirely on drafts to fill up the ranks at the front, for the untrained men who went to the front and fought beside trained men under competent officers soon found themselves efficient soldiers. The Russian Army, on the other hand, insisted upon a system of reserves going out in semi-trained units, and those semi-trained units, when they came alongside the depleted units, were not half so good as the units who had been out there for some time. Again, in the American War, the generals had only been in the field some months when they realised that semi-trained units were simply stumbling-blocks for fighting purposes. It might be laid down that 500 semi-trained drafts were better than a thousand men in a semi-trained unit. By his scheme the Secretary of State abolished the idea of the Militia volunteering, asked the Militia force to transfer itself to the Territorial Army, and at the same time started a special contingent in which men would be trained and fitted to join the ranks of the Regular forces during the time of emergency. It was proposed that a large number of men should be supernumerary to the ranks, and that their duties should be of an essentially civil character. Six divisions in the field would require about 30,000 men—telegraphists, railway transport, Army Service Corps, and so on. Those men could be drawn from the civil ranks, and could be more usefully employed in that way than the Regulars themselves; and there was this advantage under the scheme, that they would only be paid during the time that they were up for military training—and not all the year round—while they would be able to take up official positions, according to their occupations, in those various services which were so essential in modern warfare. He did not think that too much stress could be laid upon the point that, whilst they wanted to effect economy in time of peace, they wished to establish machinery which would be rapidly and efficiently expansible in time of war. Assuming that we were committed to a great war, we should have the Regular Reserve to be called up at once. With the outbreak of war the mobilisation of the Regular troops to war strength would absorb very nearly the whole of the Regular Reserve, whilst it was estimated, from experience, that with six divisions in the field the whole of the remainder of the special contingent Reserves would be absorbed during the first six months. That at any rate was what they might have to face in the event of a great war. All that was asked now, therefore, was that they should give a fair chance to this scheme for a special contingent, which, he considered, was in itself an improvement on any other scheme. If the Militia, as he hoped they would, consented to transfer themselves to the Territorial Army, he did not suppose that his right hon. friend would hold out with regard to a question of title, or in reference to the Militia retaining its name and traditions, assuming that they transferred themselves in any considerable numbers; they would have the Militia, Volunteers, and the Yeomanry brought together upon one basis of liability, and assimilated upon practically the same conditions. The real test of the success of the Territorial Army, of course, would be how far his right hon. friend was able to get the men. He could not himself see that there should be any great difficulty; because the right hon. Gentleman was diminishing an establishment of over 370,000 to 300,000. That diminution meant that many who had served usefully and honourably in the Auxiliary Forces in the past could hardly to-day be looked upon as efficient soldiers, and the weeding out of those would really leave an efficient element for the Territorial Army. A great deal would depend on the work done by the county associations. They would have to discriminate whether it was possible, in their own districts, to call out the men, or whether they would recommend to the Army Council that particular battalions should be called out for seven or fourteen days. They would have to go very closely into the matter of pay, because under our voluntary system the whole question of the men largely depended on the subject of pay. He strongly recommended his right hon. friend, as he had done on the First Reading, to bring the question of pay to something like a uniform standard. They wanted a wide field for recruiting for the Territorial Army, and if they paid one arm a great deal more than another they would set up a preference which would have a deterrent effect on recruiting for the other arms. At present the relative standards presented considerable anomalies. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had told them that in some Volunteer battalions the pay was 5s. per man a day. He had made careful investigation, and had never heard of such pay being given. [AN HON. MEMBER: Two shillings and sixpence.] Half-a-crown was a long way from 5s. He found, after careful investigation, that the rate of pay was between 1s. and 2s. a day, and in some Volunteer battalions there was no pay at all. The pay of the Yeomanry, 5s. 6d. a day, had been criticised. In future the right hon. Gentleman proposed that rations should be provided by the Government, also the camp equipment and other expenses. In most Yeomanry regiments 3s. a day was deducted for mess expenses, camp equipment, and so on, and, working it out, it seemed that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal only made a difference of about 1s.; and that being so, he urged that it would be no real deterrent on recruiting for other branches of the Service if the right hon. Gentleman, in a generous spirit, allowed the Yeomanry that extra shilling. The question of pay went to the root of the matter. The young bachelor could probably afford to go out for seven days or a fortnight, and could arrange with his employers so that he would not suffer while enjoying the great benefit of training. But with the married man it was a different matter. He left his wife and family behind; he might have 30s. or 40s. a week at his trade, and if he went out for training his wife and family might have to suffer great inconvenience and privation. He suggested that in the case of married men the right hon. Gentleman might establish some system of separation allowance. It would probably be better to make a separation allowance for the wives and children of married men in the Territorial Army than to raise the pay all round. The further objection has been raised that in the event of war it would be found that a large number of men in the Territorial Army, on its being mobilised, would be the very men who would be required to undertake extra work in civil professions, and that therefore the scheme would break down. That was not a defect of his right hon. friend's scheme. It was a defect of the voluntary system. Where there was a system of universal training under which all men underwent training in their early years that defect was entirely removed, but at the present time this country would not countenance anything of the kind. Whatever scheme was propounded they would always have to face the initial difficulty at the time of mobilisation of the Territorial Army of asking men to come forward in the interests of their country, and that was bound to cause dislocation in certain industries. The plan of the right hon. Gentleman, in his judgment, as far as it went, was a great advance on any other scheme. He hoped that as time went on the present expeditionary force of 160,000 men would undergo considerable reduction, because it was a much larger force than was anticipated. He hoped as the Territorial Army was organised that there would be a gradual encroachment upon the Cardwell system by further reductions in the Regular troops. He believed that the Territorial Army would cost more than the right hon. Gentleman had estimated, but that was a detail for Committee. He hoped the House would forget in regard to this question that it was a Party assembly and bear in mind that it represented the nation. He trusted that all hon. Members would loyally join together and endeavour to produce the best scheme, and thereby establish a military machine upon a voluntary basis that would be sufficient for the needs of the nation and the Empire.

*VISCOUNT VALENTIA (Oxford) said that whether one approved of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman or not, one could not help admiring the courage with which he had brought forward these far-reaching proposals. Of course there were one or two very large "ifs" which had to be faced, and they had been referred to by almost every speaker. One of those "ifs" was as to whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able to get the number of men he required. Another was whether he would be able to obtain them at anything like the estimated cost. The right hon. Gentleman had propounded a scheme which, as far as some sections of the Auxiliary Forces were concerned, might work extremely well, but there was one branch of the Service with which he had been connected for many years, in regard to which he did not think it would work well, and that was the Yeomanry, to which the right hon. Gentleman looked to provide the cavalry for the Territorial Force. Before altering the terms of the present Yeomanry service it would be well carefully to consider what the Yeomanry had done in the past. The Yeomanry as he knew them a good many years ago were inefficient and almost useless, and the only excuse for their existence was that they were cheap. It should not be forgotten that the Yeomanry were reorganised later than any other service, and he thought the Secretary of State for War would do well to consider carefully whether it would not be worth his while to leave that force as it was at present, and allow them to develop and expand under the scheme he was now putting forward. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that in all the proposals he had put forward with regard to Army organisation he had taken the soldiers into his confidence, and that he had relied a good deal upon the advice of those soldiers who were at the top of the tree. No doubt as far as the Regular service was concerned there could not be a more excellent source of information than the old soldiers afforded, but for the Auxiliary Forces he did not think the right hon. Gentleman could have gone to a more fruitless or useless source than to the old soldiers who were at the top of the military tree. He yielded to no man in his respect for, and admiration of the officers whose long and distinguished service had placed them in high positions at the War Office, but he happened to know their history, and he knew how incompatible their previous service was with an extensive knowledge of the Auxiliary Forces. During the years he had served in the Yeomanry he had attended a good many inspections of regiments year after year, and he had frequently met inspecting officers and colonels of cavalry regiments who had told him in conversation that they had never seen a Yeomanry regiment before. Although it was true that the Yeomanry had only been recently organised, it was, as a matter of fact, in a fairly efficient state at the present moment. He believed the right hon. Gentleman had said on a previous occasion that the Yeomanry at 5s. 6d. a day was an expensive luxury. If inquiries were made as to the price of hiring a man and a horse in any county in the country it would be found that the cost would be the same as that of the Yeomanry to-day. The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool had told them that the Swiss auxiliary cavalry cost the same amount as the Yeomanry. He had made inquiries in the neighbourhood in which he lived, and he found that 7s. a day was the average price for the hire of a horse and a man. The contractors who were constructing a branch of the Great Western Railway in his district were now paying for a horse and man 7s. a day, and they did not get either a very intelligent man or a trained horse fit for active service. Attention had been drawn to the fact that the Yeoman provided for himself a great deal more than the Regular soldier, because he had to supply his own kit, boots, forage, and other things. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman would find that the Yeomanry after they had been converted into the cavalry of the Territorial Force would be any cheaper; at all events, the difference in the cost would be very small. He was sure the Yeomanry would very much appreciate being left to serve on the same terms as they were on at present. No less an authority than Sir G. Fleetwood Wilson had calculated that a Yeoman cost £21 5s. 2d. and a Militiaman £21 19s. 3d. He did not know that there was any particular difference in their efficiency, but that comparison showed that the Yeomanry were not the most expensive soldiers, in spite of the higher rate of pay they received. He believed the Yeomanry of this country were as efficient as any auxiliary cavalry force in Europe, and, with the exception of their armament, they were now as efficient as it was possible to make any auxiliary mounted force in the country. The Yeomanry were still armed with the bayonet, which was a useless weapon for a mounted man, because it was impossible for him to make a proper use of it. During his service in the South African War there was only one occasion when the Yeomanry were called upon to fix bayonets, and his experience of the weapon was that they were used by the men for picketting pegs or opening meat tins. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce the permanent staff of both the Militia and the Yeomanry. Whether the Militia would stand such a reduction or not he did not know, but he was confident that no such reduction was advisable so far as the Yeomanry were concerned, unless they were prepared to sacrifice a good deal of efficiency. It had been suggested that an enterprising young solicitor might serve as an adjutant at the salary of £100 a year. He was afraid that, on those terms, no solicitor who had a practice of his own and possessed sufficient knowledge to perform the duties with satisfaction to himself or credit to the force would be inclined to attach himself to a Yeomanry regiment. The Yeomanry were considered efficient not only by the right hon. Gentleman himself, but by all military critics on whose opinion he relied. If they were an efficient and popular force, they were also a Territorial Force, both as to officers and men, and in that respect they fulfilled the idea of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman as to a Territorial Army. Surely it was rash to throw away the whole of that branch of the service, and to make it impossible for officers and men to remain in the new force, which would be reduced both in strength and in efficiency.

*Mr. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate) said he agreed with several hon. Members who had expressed regret at the Party spirit in which this question was approached by the Opposition. He further regretted that those Members on both sides who were officers, or had been members, of the Regular or Auxiliary Forces had not met together earlier to consider, without in any way binding themselves, what points they might suggest as improvements in the scheme. He was satisfied that the Secretary of State for War desired to take the sense of all Parties in evolving a scheme which would be satisfactory to the House, and, therefore, permanent. In the criticism that day there had been a tendency to deal with the scheme too much in detail and to foreshadow the destruction of the whole or parts of the Volunteer Forces as they now existed. He did not think that there need be any fear of that sort. He did not think there was any reason to suppose that by this scheme the Militia would be destroyed. The Militia would have an opportunity of serving in two ways. One part, which desired to do so, would give more time, and would therefore receive more money for the work which they did. The remaining portion would join the Volunteers and the Yeomanry, as known to-day, in forming the proposed Territorial Army on what might be called a mild Militia basis. He believed the scheme provided for a well-equipped, highly-efficient, and on the whole economical expeditionary force. He himself thought it was too large a force. By means of the Territorial Army the scheme also provided for completely organised cavalry brigades and infantry divisions distributed throughout the United Kingdom, ready to serve at any given moment. Those who knew about the present condition of the Auxiliary Forces knew that, large as they were in numbers, they were to a great extent useless. The money spent on them was to a great extent wasted because they were not organised and equipped and in a condition which would enable them to take the field. As to the cost of this Territorial Army, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had allowed sufficient money for the work it would have to do. Roughly, he calculated that the present cost of the Auxiliary Forces, as a whole, worked out at about £12 per head per annum, while that of the whole of the new Territorial Army, apart from that specially trained portion which was to be joined in time of war to the Regular Army, worked out at about £9 5s. He did not think they could expect to get the new force to undertake harder conditions for less money. The present cost of the Yeomanry worked out at about £21 per head per annum, while the cost of the cavalry of the Territorial Force would be, under the scheme, about £14. That seemed rather an unnecessary reduction, considering the numbers with which the right hon. Gentleman was dealing. If the right hon. Gentleman were willing to pay as much for the Territorial Cavalry as he now paid for the Yeomanry, it would not cost more than about another £130,000 beyond the amount he had laid down in his Paper. He thought it would be impossible for the right hon. Gentleman to obtain the force at the cost at which he hoped to get it. It was never possible to get men to do casual work at the same rate as permanent work. In the case of the cavalry it was proposed to take the men for a certain portion of the year, and to ask them to give up their time for drill, during the year just as the Yeomanry did at present. They could not be expected to do that without a rather better scale of pay than was given to men in the similar force permanently engaged. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that it would only be necessary to provide the members of the whole of the Territorial Force with one suit of clothes or one uniform. He did not think that would popularise the force in the country. Of course it was not the sole or chief inducement, but there was no doubt that the uniform influenced recruiting to some extent, and unless the right hon. Gentleman gave a uniform for show occasions, apart from the working suit, he would find a considerable falling off in the recruiting. It would be a matter of great regret if the Territorial Army were to be deprived of the services of adjutants from the Regular Army. It would be better to dispense with some of the higher officers from the Regular Forces, proposed to be given to the Territorial Army, in order to have a more complete Regular staff, and in order to maintain the adjutants from the Regulars. To obtain the extra money for the Territorial Force he suggested that the numbers of the Regular Army should be reduced. It had been said again and again that the expeditionary force was much larger than had ever been previously contemplated. Without trenching greatly on the Cardwellian principle, he thought they could do without a certain number of the battalions of the Regular Army. He did not suggest for a moment that the battalions should be disbanded at once, or until the new Territorial Army was organised. After all, they could get so much more out of the Auxiliary Forces in point of numbers for the money spent on them than they could get from the Regular forces. The cost of a regular soldier was from £80 to £90 per year, while the figures for the Auxiliary Forces were much less than that. He thought that the Regular Army was composed of very good material, but if they were to have a strong popular force at home, they must find the money for it. He knew that there was a feeling that the system suggested for obtaining officers for the Home Army was not sufficiently democratic; but he thought that that impression could, without great difficulty, be removed. It would depend to a certain extent upon the composition and power of the county associations. At present we were largely dependent upon the public schools and the Universities for the kind of men wanted as officers. And that was because young fellows got from these institutions the kind of education on which it was easy to shape them into good officers, in a fairly short time. It was for that reason that he wished to extend greater opportunities for secondary education to all classes, so that we might be able to get the best kind of officer from every class. As to the composition of the county associations, he certainly thought that the Bill as drafted did not make them sufficiently democratic. If the Territorial Army was to become a living force, its fate must be given more into its own hand. He did not like to see such a preponderance of the representation of the Regular forces in the management of the Territorial Army. He was much afraid that the military advisers of the right hon. Gentleman, who had in their hearts a great desire for conscription, hoped that his scheme would fail. He hoped that without Party spirit they would in Committee make the scheme of the Secretary for War such a success as would prevent all possible idea of conscription being imposed on the country.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said that almost all the speeches made by Members on the Ministerial Benches contained one most important criticism, and that was that a sufficiently strong Territorial Army could not be created for the sum of money which the Secretary of State intended to spend. If that was the case, or if this scheme was not going to effect an economy, then the Government must re-consider their position. He was one of those who, like right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, had tried to make himself acquainted with the provisions of the Bill, but the more he studied it the more complicated the scheme seemed to be. In fact, the whole Bill was as vague and nebulous as it was possible for a Bill to be. In his speeches the Secretary for War had made a great appeal to country gentlemen and employers of labour to form county associations in order to raise men for the Territorial Army. That was returning to the system in vogue in the feudal ages, to which he was opposed, and he was afraid that the scheme would probably provide us with a Territorial Army whose manoeuvres would be more fit for the Middle Ages than for modern warfare. In order to consider this matter in all respects, they must first of all take stock of what the right hon. Gentlemen was going to destroy. It was useless for hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches to say they did not believe that the Bill was going to destroy the Militia. As he understood the Bill, by it our present Auxiliary Forces would be destroyed or altogether changed in character. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Chippenham that it was all to the good to get men into the Army Reserve. They were the best and cheapest soldiers that could be obtained. He was certain that it was greatly owing to the splendid patriotism and excellent services of the Reservists that the South African War was brought to a successful conclusion. Under this scheme we should not get Reservists equal to the men we were losing. The Secretary for War ought, in his opinion, to have retained the extra battalion of the Guards, by which men could be passed quickly into the Reserve. The new special service troops could not receive training equal to that of men who had served three years with the Regulars under the strictest discipline and the most highly trained officers the country could produce. As to the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, the Bill abolished the whole principles upon which those forces had been maintained and regarded in the past. He was free to admit, however, that there was a great difference of military opinion upon the subject. Leading generals frequently, when they made speeches at dinners, prize-givings and public functions, said that the Yeomanry, the Militia, and our Auxiliary Forces generally, were very fine fellows and most valuable to the country and the service, and he believed that one of our chief Generals on his return from South Africa made a speech in which he said that the C.I.V.'s were the best troops that he had ever had under his command. When, however, these distinguished Generals sat upon Commissions those Commissions made reports absolutely contradictory to that, declaring that the Auxiliary Forces were absolutely inefficient and unable to stand up against the first line of Continental troops. But nobody in this country could suppose that we should have men in the second-line Army, who, at the outbreak of war, would be able to take their place against the first line of foreign Powers. He believed that Germany and France did not expect that, and that in those countries it was not the case that such troops existed. To his mind, therefore, it was absolutely begging the question to reason in that manner, and to throw the whole of the Auxiliary Forces as they were at present into the melting pot in order to obtain something of which they knew nothing. It was a very great mistake, in his judgment, to do that, because, forsooth, certain military authorities thought the Auxiliary Forces were not fit to meet the first line of Continental armies in the field. Military opinion appeared to be much divided on the subject. Certainly under the present system excellent troops were raised and maintained. What was the Territorial Army which was to take their place? From beginning to end of the Bill there was nothing to show that it would be an efficient force to take the field. Everything was left to future schemes and directions which were yet to be drawn up. The only thing they had at present was the statement of the Secretary for War that he wanted 300,000 men, for whom he was going to pay £2,800,000. Our present Auxiliary Forces numbered between 300,000 and 400,000 men, and cost £4,500,000. How did the right hon. Gentleman expect to get a more efficient fighting force for the second line when he cut down the expenses in that way? The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have in his mind the feudal system, and probably he realised that the money voted by Parliament would be entirely insufficient, and expected that as soon as the county associations were formed the hat would be sent round for voluntary subscriptions for pay and equipment. Indeed, as much was hinted at in Clause 3, under which the associations were enabled to make use of money which came to them from other sources than Parliament. In order that this scheme should succeed he believed there must be a very large demand for subscriptions from people in the counties where the territorial forces were set up. As to the efficiency of the Territorial Army, he was one of those who believed that no force, whether it was the first line or the second line of auxiliaries, would be of the least value, or at all events would be of very low value, unless it was properly disciplined. He did not refer merely to men obeying readily and willingly their officers on all occasions; there was something more important than that, and it was the officers obeying the commands of their superior officers in no carping spirit. One of the greatest difficulties that officers had to contend with was the maintenance of discipline, and if anyone thoroughly conversant with the Army inquired into the matter they would find that those battalions which did the best service in the war in South Africa and in every other war were those in which the highest state of discipline had been maintained, and where both the officers and men had been accustomed to obey without quibbling. That was true with regard to the Guards, the Regulars and the Auxiliary Forces. It was absolutely essential that there should be discipline in the ranks and among the officers. He turned to the Bill to see if this Territorial Force would be efficient. As regarded that he was pleased to see at the outset some words to the effect that the Bill dealt with the government, discipline, and pay of the Army, but if they read the Bill they would find that there was nothing about pay in it, except that the soldiers were to be paid as much as the Secretary of State for War issued orders for, and although the right hon. Gentleman had given them a memorandum, there was nothing in the Bill which said that any man was to receive any pay at all—they were all dependent upon the good will and liberality of the Secretary of State for War. In regard to discipline it was exactly the same. The Bill simply said that orders on the subject were to be issued by the Secretary of State. The only definite statement was that if a man were disobedient he was to be discharged. In fact, so great were the difficulties thrown in the way of a man's leaving the force, if he so desired, that the simplest thing for him to do seemed to be to disobey his commanding officer. He did not think the Bill would satisfy anybody who wished that the scheme should be a reality and not a sham, nor did he think the condition of these forces could be satisfactory. He knew the difficulty about the Auxiliary Forces and had always thought that this country would never have a proper service until it was provided that if a man took upon himself the burden of defending his country he should have certain advantages and privileges over his fellow citizens, say in the way of voting, increased pay, exemption from taxation, or qualification for old-age pensions. The inducements held out by the Secretary for War, however, would not have much power to keep men in the forces. So far as he could make out, the only advantage that was offered to induce a man to join the force was that if he were a Member of Parliament he need not vacate his seat, and if he were an elector he would not be disfranchised. The only thing provided was that the members of the Territorial Force were not to suffer disadvantage in those ways. There was not sufficient provision made as regarded pay and discipline, and the whole of the provisions in regard to those matters were very indefinite. Thinking that he himself might join the Territorial Force he read the Bill to see if he could find something definite as to what he might make himself liable to, but he found the provisions as to that also very indefinite. They must not, moreover, be always content to take it that what was said by Ministers and others in their speeches was embodied in their Bill. He remembered that some time ago, in 1901, he thought, when the Yeomanry was being reorganised, Mr. Brodrick stated in the House that he was most anxious in reorganising the Yeomanry to provide every facility for Volunteers who could ride to join the Yeomanry and become Yeomanry and Volunteers. He heard the right hon. Gentleman make that statement, and acting upon it he went down to his constituency and proceeded to enlist some ten or twenty Volunteers in the Yeomanry. A short time afterwards he had an indignant letter from the Colonel of the Volunteer regiment complaining that certain people were walking about the town sometimes in Volunteer uniform and sometimes in Yeomanry uniform. He got very frightened and thought that perhaps he had rendered himself liable to be Court-martialled and to have heavy penalties inflicted on him. He consulted a friend on the question, and he was then told that he need not bother himself as the Government would be only too glad to get a man to count twice over, once on the Volunteer establishment and again on the Yeomanry establishment. When they came to the actual formation of the new territorial force they had to consider what the Bill set forth and what training the men were to receive. The question of the terms of service and the question of training were left in the most vague position. Everything was "as may be prescribed." The annual training might be eight, fifteen, or thirty days, or might be dispensed with altogether. The only thing certain was that a man who, having joined the territorial force, failed to appear when the force was embodied for six months training in time of war, would be treated as a deserter. There was no penalty stated; but the penalty for desertion in face of the enemy was shooting. It therefore came to this, that the right hon. Gentleman was asking the country to throw away the present Auxiliary Forces and in their place to accept a scheme in which there was nothing certain with regard to discipline, or pay, or terms of service, or preliminary drill, or annual training. If any man when he had enlisted in the territorial force could make out under what conditions he was serving he would be a perfect wonder. Yet one of the provisions was that every person authorised to enlist recruits was to state to the recruit the terms of the contract to be entered into. How on earth could a recruiting officer comply with such a requirement? The officer or sergeant who, wishing to secure a recruit, could inform the man of the conditions of service would be clever indeed. If the scheme should be successful, if the War Office found a large number of men forthcoming, then after the men were enlisted fresh orders would be issued, the screw would be put in motion, and the training would be lengthened. If, on the other hand, the men were not obtained—as he believed they would not be—then the screw would be relaxed, there would be Orders in Council, orders from the Secretary of State, from the Army Council, and from the associations, reducing the number of drills, and the 300,000 men would perhaps be obtained, but they would not be properly trained. The man who joined the Army would be in the position of a man playing a game in which his adversary made the rules as they went along. Military authorities should declare the minimum of training required and the men should be enlisted on that understanding, but this scheme was simply a means by which the screw could be tightened or relaxed as it might suit political exigencies and influence elections.

*COLONEL HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.) said he had not the opportunity of listening to the earlier portion of the speech of the noble Lord, but he came in in time to hear his excellent remarks upon discipline. He, as an old soldier, agreed with every word the noble Lord had said on that point. The noble Lord's anxiety as to the amount of training required could not be relieved by laying down a hard and fast rule, for degrees of capacity varied, and he would be sorry to say how long it would take the noble Lord or any Member of the House to become proficient in the "goose" step or any other part of the military art. The rules must be left elastic, and the power given in this Bill should be left in the hands of the military authority to prolong or curtail the time of instruction as circumstances required. To hon. and right hon. Members opposite they were in the habit of looking for Imperial views on many subjects, and he asked them to take a broader view, and see if there was not an Imperial side to the questions raised by the Bill. Outside these islands were our great dependencies, as was pointed out by the right hon. Member for Dover, who alone of those whom he had heard speak from the other side touched a little on the Imperial side of the question. The right hon. Member had reminded the House of the great English-speaking communities over seas, but even the right hon. Gentleman failed to realise that in this Bill our military organisation was being brought nearer to that existing in other parts of the Empire than it had been brought by any previous measure. He had had personal knowledge for many years of the local Forces in one of our principal Colonies, and he would refer to that experience as bearing on this measure. The Government had been represented as being desirous of abolishing the Militia by the Bill now before the House. But so far from abolishing the Militia, they were restoring its true spirit. They were going back, not to feudalism as had been suggested, but to the principles which once underlay the Militia system in this country and which still underlay the Militia system in our Colonies. There the dread of militarism was so strong that they would not have any troops except those raised on a Militia basis under a law precisely similar to that now proposed by this Bill. In Canada, the Colony to which he had particularly referred, they had one Act under which all the forces of the Colony were raised —the Militia Act. Under that Act there were troops who served under precisely the same conditions as our Regulars, but the jealousy of the Militia principle was so strong that the Parliament insisted that those troops should be raised under and be subject to the Militia Act. The difference between those troops and others was that they were called up for continuous training whilst the others were only called upon for periodical training. The elasticity provided in this Bill was necessary to curtail or prolong the period during which the services of the troops might be required for the benefit of the country. The hon. Member for the Central Division of Sheffield had criticised the measure because it placed the whole of the Auxiliary Forces under one Act; and the mover of the Amendment had said it was impossible to unite under one system all the Auxiliary Forces unless we had compulsion. That difficulty had been got over in Canada. There were there different classes of the community who could not all perform service under the same conditions; and the Act under which they served had been modified by regulations so as to allow each class of the community to perform their training in the way best suited to their ordinary avocations. It permitted such training as our Volunteers received and the more continuous training given to the Militia in camps and barracks. It went further and permittted continuous training such as the Regulars received. That disposed of the purely imaginary difficulty and fear that, if all the Auxiliary Forces were placed under one Act and formed into a homogeneous Territorial Force, the Force would be weakened because it would be impossible to employ all the different classes of the community. Exception had been taken to the proposal to place all troops raised for the Territorial Army entirely on their own basis and not to furnish them with a permanent staff. When he took over the command of the Militia troops in Canada, though he found that many of his predecessors had urged and pressed for the adoption of the English principle of a permanent staff, he received the impression that it was going against the feeling of the people to introduce into the Canadian system that permanent element. He, therefore, took the view that every unit should maintain itself in every particular—that its own officers and non-commissioned officers should be its instructors and he believed the results justified that view. It was only in that way that the esprit de corps or rather the esprit de regiment which was necessary to produce good units could be obtained. Given that spirit and suitable arrangements, such as schools, for training instructors, he had no fear for the result. He did not wish to labour the point. His only object in intervening was to show that they were not trying a new experiment in this Bill. It was not a speculative measure, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover had said, for a similar system existed in Switzerland, and with admirable results, though under a compulsory system. Such a system might exist with equal success without compulsion. He believed more in democratic enthusiasm than in bureaucratic compulsion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon agreed that the Militia had fallen on evil days, but while agreeing with the diagnosis of the Secretary of State, he seemed to object to the application of any form of remedy. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman's earnest zeal for the Army, which he had shown both in office and out of office, would lead him to help in making this a measure which might once more set up that fine old Force on which they all looked with pride, the old Militia Force.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): It is only too evident from the empty state of the House that great national questions involving the gravest issues are under consideration. But we are used to this on Army debates, and I hope that on this occasion the smallness of the attendance is not entirely due to the fact that I am now addressing the House. I think the Secretary for War will admit that, whatever may be the fate of this Bill in this House, the system which it proposes to set up cannot possibly come into practical being unless it receives not only the assent but the enthusiastic support of the majority of the people of this country; and, therefore, I think that it is reasonable for us to inquire what measure of support it has received so far. I think the right hon. Gentleman will be the first to admit that hitherto, at any rate, there has been a remarkable restraint of criticism, that there has been a patriotic desire exhibited to examine his proposals in an unbiassed and non-party, I might almost say in an indulgent, spirit; and I think that arises from the fact that it is recognised that he is making a serious attempt to solve the most baffling military problem that confronts a Minister of War in any country, and he is given full credit for that. But I am afraid, as far as we on this side of the House are concerned, that is as far as our approbation can go. We recognise, of course, the goodness of the right hon. Gentleman's intentions; we know that the War Office is paved with good intentions, but we feel that the scheme, however sound it may be in theory, is in many of its most vital aspects unworkable in practice. It seems to be based on a series of hypotheses which do not take into account the workings of human nature or the passive resisting power of vested interests, and, in short, whilst he has produced a scheme which is homogeneous, which is complete and even imposing on paper, in my opinion it can never be materialised and carried out in anything like the form in which he has presented it, because the officers and men will not be forthcoming. The Amendment of my right hon. friend states in very forcible terms the process of cleaning the slate on which the right hon. Gentleman is resolved. The Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, at any rate in their present form, will be practically wiped out; and whilst the right hon. Gentleman has written on the slate a very attractive scheme for reconstituting or replacing them, it all depends upon whether the existing Forces are willing to fall in with his views. I do not mean that there is any fear that they would oppose his scheme from mere "cussedness," but they may find it impossible to accept his proposals, because in their opinion they may run counter to all their interests and make their continued existence impossible. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Berwick Division said that the opposition to this scheme was really a Militia opposition. I am sorry that he spoke in a tone of such undisguised hostility towards the Militia. But, after all, the chief merit of the new scheme is that it undoubtedly introduces a uniform and homogeneous system, but that is attained at very heavy cost, particularly to the Militia and the Yeomanry, from whom, no doubt, the greater part of the opposition is likely to proceed; and it is to be carried out at what I believe to be a fatal cost, because in order to get your uniformity, you are going to level down the Auxiliary Forces to the standard of the lowest instead of levelling them up. After all, even if this opposition does come from the Militia and the Yeomanry, they are being called upon to make very grave sacrifices. These are summarised perhaps as well as they can be by the military correspondent of The Times, who wrote the other day that—

> "The Militia loses its cherished indentity as a separate Force and is asked to give up its substance and become a new Reserve to the Regular Army. The Yeomanry are asked to revert from a high rate of pay to the standard of the cavalry of the line. We may get yeomen of a kind at the rates proposed, but it is not certain that it will be the same fine Force that it was."

I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman will find that, as time goes on, this foreboding will be only too well justified. The Volunteers are doubtless less upset by the scheme than either of the two other portions of the Auxiliary Forces; their traditions are more preserved, and by this means, no doubt, the edge of their opposition will be considerably blunted. But has the right hon. Gentleman any assurance that his proposals will be accepted by the bulk of the Volunteer Forces; because unless his proposal is accepted, not merely with assent but with enthusiasm, the scheme is bound to die from lack of driving power. I feel sure that he recognises that. Has he received that assurance with regard to the practicability and popularity of the county associations? We have heard one Volunteer officer behind him, the hon. Member for East Edinburgh, and I think that it is evident that he is strongly opposed to the county associations. I have endeavoured during the recess to ascertain the opinions of a number of prominent Volunteer officers with regard to this question. I found that they all had an anxious desire, in a soldier-like spirit, to assist the right hon. Gentleman as far as they possibly could, but at the same time they pointed out grave defects in his scheme, particularly as to the proposed county associations, which, in their opinion, are given a far too ambitious and extended list of duties. A great many of them are in favour of modified county associations, with comparatively minor duties; but with the list of duties as now proposed they consider there will be over centralisation, that it will lead to work being done at the headquarters of the associations which could be done much better at the headquarters of the units, and that the chief result will be friction, followed by a great deal of extra work, and, as is inevitable in all these cases, a great deal of extra cost. Coming to a smaller matter, that is the abolition of the Regular adjutants, I find that proposal is universally condemned. I do not think in the debate to-day that there has been hardly a single opinion in favour of it. It seems to me that this step can only be defended on the principle of saving money at any cost, and surely it is a notable example of spoiling the ship for a halfpennyworth of tar. Of course I have heard with great respect the opinion expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for South Monmouthshire, whose experience with the Canadian Militia is very great. I had the honour of serving with him when he was in Canada, and he knows that any opinion which he could express would be received by me with great respect. But I cannot altogether allow his opinion to weigh against that of the bulk of Volunteer officers in this country, who have had practical experience of the work of their own corps, in which the conditions are not precisely the same as those which obtain in the Canadian Militia. I also find, unfortunately for the scheme, a consensus of opinion among the Volunteer officers whom I have consulted, that the terms of service as set forth in the Bill—and I cannot but believe that they are made unnecessarily forbidding in the wording of the Bill—will cause a number of good men to resign and discourage fresh men from joining. The discouragements are first of all the penalties, which, I gather from the right hon. Gentleman, he does not propose to enforce. If he does not propose to enforce them, why does he put them in the Bill? He says they may be wanted.

MR. HALDANE said the penalties were similar to those contained in the Volunteer Corps Rules at the present time. The Government had only substituted new machinery.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE: I think that the right hon. Gentleman has made the penalties very much more formidable than they were; at any rate, they are so regarded by Volunteers, and after all the important thing is that if they think so it is going to discourage enlistment. The other thing which I am told will discourage enlistment is the obligation to be liable to six months embodiment in the case of emergency. The War Office is no doubt counting upon the patriotism of employers to secure men in their jobs if they are called out in this way. I hope the War Office will be justified in their hope. But will they set a practical example? Is the Government prepared to guarantee that any men who are in the Government service and who are called out for six months under this Bill, will have their full pay, or at any rate that the difference between their full pay in their employment and their pay received as Volunteers, shall be secured to them, or their families, and their places kept open for them? That would be a practical test of the Government's patriotism in this matter, and I will at any rate give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of expressing an opinion on that subject by moving an Amendment later on in the Committee Stage of the Bill. Personally I cannot help thinking that this obligation which is to be kept hanging over the heads of the men who may be in steady employment, will be an even greater discouragement to recruiting than would be the same period of training at the beginning of the term of enlistment, because after all there are always a certain number of men, particularly young men, who may be out of a job at the time, or who are willing to wait for a job until they have completed a definite period of training. They would begin the training at once and thus know what they were in for, and the experience they would gain during that long preliminary period might well be kept up by that short period of annual training which the right hon. Gentleman proposes in his Bill. At any rate while by such a process you might get a less number of men, yet you would get a far higher rate of efficiency, and, when an emergency arose, you could always fill up with a similar class of recruits to those that you expect to get under the existing terms of enlistment. The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division gave us some interesting information with regard to the Swiss army. He pointed out with great force that one of the secrets of success of the Swiss system was that the longer period of training—six weeks—comes at the commencement instead of being held over until an emergency arises. I do ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would not be better to have the longer period at the commencement rather than to hold over the head of the recruit that it will only be enforced when war has broken out. I must refer for a moment to a recent speech by General Sir John French, in which he is reported to have said that—

> "The new scheme is based on the principle that it is the bounden duty of every young man to take part in his country's defence."

If he is correctly reported, I can only surmise that the right hon. Gentleman's speech in explanation of, and his printed memorandum on, this Bill must have been singularly misunderstood by the gallant and distinguished soldier, because surely, nothing can be further from the facts. As a matter of fact, by the Bill the vast majority of able bodied young men are encouraged to evade this duty, whilst the few who do voluntarily consent to qualify, in a dilettante sort of way, are threatened with pains and penalties if, subsequently, they happen to change their minds. One would have imagined from General Sir John French's speech as reported, that the Militia Ballot Act is being brought into force, and that, in that way, an old obligation which has long since fallen into desuetude, is being revived by the right hon. Gentleman. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, on this point, whether he proposes that the Militia Ballot Act should now lapse altogether, or whether he proposes to keep it in existence?

MR. HALDANE: This Bill does not touch the Militia Ballot Act, but, even if it were brought into force, it would be found to be unworkable. Further than that, it allows paid substitution, which, I think, is a most vicious principle.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE: We all admit that the Act is not what it should be, but it is all we have got, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not allow it to lapse.

MR. HALDANE: It will not lapse.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE: In studying this Territorial Army, I could not help being reminded of a remark of Lord North's when the list of officers who were to serve in an approaching campaign was submitted to him. He said—

> "I do not know what effect these names will have on the enemy, but I know they make me tremble."

I think I might apply that remark to the right hon. Gentleman's Territorial Army. I do not wish to be accused of undue levity, but I should venture to describe it as a "Snodgrass Army"—and I hope the right hon. Gentleman and the Government generally are better acquainted with their "Pickwick" than they were with the Scriptures in the earlier part of the debate. I think the right hon. Gentleman will remember that on the only occasion on which Mr. Snodgrass was called upon to fight, it was related that—

> "In a truly Christian spirit, and in order that he might take no one unawares, he announced in a very loud tone that he was going to begin, and proceeded to take off his coat with the utmost deliberation."

What was the result? In the next sentence I find—

> "He was immediately surrounded and secured," and, as he was led away captive—

I do not see, seriously, how any one can possibly defend the theory of causing an army to commence its training after hostilities have actually begun, and which proceeds on the assumption that there will be a "close time" for a force of this kind in modern war. We have heard a great deal in the course of the debate about another grievous defect in the right hon. Gentleman's Territorial Army, and that is with regard to the artillery question. The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division said that the advantage of the new scheme was that it gave "cohesion and artillery" to the second line. I have endeavoured to show that it does not give cohesion, and

I think I can show that it cannot possibly give efficiency to the artillery. The Times correspondent has described the artillery problem as being the greatest of the unsolved problems in connection with the Territorial Army. But the new scheme does not solve the artillery problem. It merely aggravates it, and when this matter was discussed on a previous occasion the right hon. Gentleman, if I may say so, showed a curious testiness and irritability with regard to criticisms of the artillery. He recognised no doubt that it was a fatal weakness, and he did not like attention being called to it. At any rate, he derided the long experience of artillery experts, and dismissed their opinions with the taunt that there was "more superstition about artillery than about any other subject except theology." If he were in a position where he was exposed to rapid bursts of shrapnel, while he was endeavouring to adjust a fuse or a telescopic sight, he would find that there was considerable cogency in the superstition. Speaking to his constituents, only in September last, the right hon. Gentleman said "We need more Artillery, and nothing short of the best will do." But he is about to reduce the best and to create for the second line of the Army an artillery which is bound to be the worst in Europe. [Cries of "Why?"] Because it will be untrained and armed with inferior weapons. It will be unfit to go into action against the only enemy which it can possibly be called upon to fight. But perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's real excuse was disclosed in the reply which he made to an interruption of mine, during the previous debate. The right hon. Gentleman then said that he—

> "Hoped the contingency would not arise of this Territorial Artillery having to fight at all."

And of course if they are not intended for purposes of war it does not matter how they are trained or armed. In spite of what the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division said, I contend that the training to be given to this force will be hopelessly and ludicrously inadequate. The right hon. Gentleman bases his hopes on the experience of the Lancashire Militia Field Artillery. But that comparison is altogether inadequate and misleading. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman read a recent debate in the United Service Institution, in which most of the officers of the Lancashire Field Artillery took part. Colonel Wing, who commands that force, described his three batteries. He pointed out that they had a permanent staff of 120 Regulars, or one Regular to every two Militiamen; that half of the non-commissioned officers and most of the specialists were Regulars; that the recruits began with twenty-eight days training on enlistment, and that was followed by eight weeks continuous training every summer for the batteries, and an extra month for non-commissioned officers and specialists. Further, he pointed out that though the Lancashire Field Artillery did extremely well in the circumstances, they were only placed as third class at the inspection on Salisbury Plain. Compare with this the fact that the new Territorial Artillery would only have from eight to fifteen days training annually. There would be only fourteen to eighteen Regulars per battery, and there would be no Regular officers, or even Regular adjutants. Colonel Wing added—

> "If a large increase of Militia Field Artillery is to be made, you cannot get such a high standard of officer as in the Lancashire Field Artillery; in fact, I am sure you cannot get them."

Colonel Wing also pointed out the great difficulty there would be about non-commissioned officers. These remarks were fully endorsed by Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell-Hyslop of the Lancashire Militia Field Artillery, who said that the Regular nucleus of their batteries was the secret of their success, and he compared it to a nucleus crew of a battleship which trains throughout the year and "keeps the whole show in order." Colonel F. G. Stone, late Inspector-General of Canadian Field Artillery said—

> "No country can produce many officers of that kind, nor can it be expected that there are many of these special officers or non-commissioned officers to go round."

Colonel Stone further said that—

> "A Militia non-commissioned officer can never exercise the same authority as a Regular non-commissioned officer, because if he did he would be liable to retaliation when the training was over.'

Then the debate was summed up by one of the greatest living authorities upon artillery training, Major-General Sir George Marshall, who pointed out that—

> "The experiment with the Lancashire Field Artillery has been a small one, and I do not believe in small experiments proving anything in a large way. . . . I do not see how we are going to have a Militia Field Artillery fit to go into action and to fight Regulars unless they are as good as the enemy. . . . In my opinion the introduction of quick-firing guns will necessitate that the commissioned officers of batteries shall be men of the highest capacity and training—men who have been trained all their lives to it."

But perhaps the unkindest blow of all given to the right hon. Gentleman came from his Fidus Achates, The Times military correspondent, who summed up the controversy by declaring that—

> "If any politician believes that he is going to obtain officers fit to command modern quick-firing batteries from among people who do not give up their whole time to the study and practice of artillery, the first battle in which these persons are engaged would disabuse him of that belief."

He added—

> "Half-trained officers and half-trained men have no business to touch these guns. They will not get half the results attained by the trained hands; they will get no useful result at all."

These are the opinions of the best qualified experts, and I do not think that the right hon Gentleman will be able to dismiss them as artillery superstitions. Then I wish to touch on the question of the matériel of the batteries—that is to say, the guns with which they are to be armed. I base my criticism from experience in the field. It has been conclusively proved to be a disastrous policy to attempt to arm half-trained troops with an inferior weapon, for unless these troops are given at least as good a weapon as that possessed by their adversaries, they will be hopelessly demoralised before going into action at all. The right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to create the impression that the converted 15-pounder gun with which he proposes to arm the Territorial Artillery will be as good as that with which they are likely to be faced. I put down a Question on the subject, and I am afraid by the form of the Question I may have afforded the right hon. Gentleman inviting opportunities of giving figures which really do not institute a true comparison between the converted 15-pounder and the guns of other nations. It may be the fault of my Question, but the figures given were very misleading. The right hon. Gentleman gave the range of the 15-pounder gun as being 5,900 yards, which he showed as being equal to, and in the case of the German gun, in excess of the range of the guns of other countries. He did not say, however, that that means that we happen to have a fuse which will burn a sufficient time to enable that range to be obtained, and that in order to get it the gun has to be elevated to an angle of twenty-five degrees, and the remaining velocity is so small and the angle of descent so great that the effect of the projectile will be practically nil. I really do not understand the right hon. Gentleman's figures with regard to the comparison with the German gun, which he showed to be very inferior to the French gun and even to this converted 15-pounder. But do his figures refer to the old German gun which I understand has now been discarded, or to the new German gun which is to be taken into use in the German Army? I think in making any comparison of any kind he ought to give the figures of the latest German gun, and I will put myself in order by putting down a Question on the subject. In conclusion, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that I am not pressing this artillery question in any captious spirit. It is a subject which has interested me most of my life, and I hope that he will examine into it further, and that on further examination he will admit that he has not given sufficient consideration either to the personnel or to the matériel of this force. I think he may carry his passion for uniformity too far, and in my opinion the only safe plan as regards the artillery is to increase the Regular artillery to a sufficient extent to enable it to serve the needs both of the field force and of the Territorial Army. If, from financial considerations, the right hon. Gentleman is unable to do that, I beg that he will accept the standard of the Lancashire Field Artillery as an irreducible minimum. If he refuses to do that, and persists in imagining he can equip an effective artillery force on the conditions laid down in the Bill, then I believe, and I understand it is the opinion of all artillery experts, he will be merely conniving at a murderous and extremely costly farce.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): The remark with which the hon. Gentleman has just concluded his speech points to this conclusion, that if we are desirous of attaining a high standard of efficiency with regard to artillery, it is quite impossible to include artillery in any Volunteer force or any force such as is in contemplation by this Bill.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: My last appeal to the right hon. Gentleman was that he will accept the standard of the Lancashire Field Artillery, which is part of the auxiliary forces, as the irreducible minimum.

*MR. BUCHANAN: Yes, but the hon. and gallant Member had said that it would be impossible if we wanted to attain a high standard of efficiency in regard to the artillery to include artillery with the arms of the force which we are creating. Of course I quite sympathise with the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who, being an artillery officer himself, naturally looks at the interests of the artillery first, in discussing this scheme. ["Oh."] I do not mean that in any offensive sense. It is desirable that those addressing the House should address it upon the particular points with which they are best acquainted. What I was going to say was that I have listened throughout the evening to the various speeches which have been made in the progress of this debate, and I think I am within the mark in saying that on the whole they have not been directed against the principle of this Bill or against its substance, but they have been mainly criticisms with regard to certain points of detail in the Bill, and they have largely been criticisms of certain points and proposals which are not in the Bill, and are not proposed by my right hon. friend, but which will properly come up for our consideration when we come to deal with the Bill in its further stages. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover in the speech which he delivered in the early part of the debate, attacked the Bill on definite lines, and he concluded his speech by moving an Amendment which, of course, if carried, would prove fatal to the Bill; but I do not think that even he is wholly hostile to the Bill, and I do not gather that he would look upon the passing of the Bill as a great calamity. I do not think that in any of the subsequent speeches from that side of the House, and certainly not from this, has there been any definite, downright fully considered hostility to the Bill. Therefore, I think my right hon. friend and the Government are justified in considering that upon the whole the debate has been favourable to the proposals before the House, and that we may look forward to the passage of the Bill through Parliament, no doubt with Amendments, and we may hope with some confidence to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this difficult Army problem that has vexed and puzzled so many minds for years past. I say with Amendments, because the Government are fully open to the value of the various criticisms that have been directed to the Bill. The clauses of the Bill are by no means intended to be an ultimatum as to what the Government have got to propose; it is rather a Bill which confers powers within which the Secretary of State and the Army Council may be able to operate. With regard to Amendments on any of the details we hold an open mind, and we shall be perfectly ready to receive suggestions favourably from all quarters of the House. To-night, therefore, I hope it will not be thought discourteous if I do not proceed to reply in detail to the many and various points that have been raised in discussion during the last three or four hours. I would rather bring the House back to the main principle of the Bill and main object that we have in view. My hon. and gallant friend the Member for Sheffield, who is not in his place, invited me to speak on this Bill. I have often in former days spoken upon questions connected with Army finance, but I never posed as being able to speak on military matters connected with the Army. I desire to speak purely as a civilian, and do not pretend to be even an amateur strategist. This Bill, as I have seen it, deals almost exclusively with the non-Regular Forces of the Crown, and with that body which was described as the second line of defence. What is the problem put before us connected with the second line of defence? We have at present ample material ready to our hands, but its organisation is not an organisation of a second line as a whole, but only of units and certain parts of it. In the same way, its training as it exists at this moment is not a scientific or systematic training. Surely, if that is the condition of the problem it is the duty of the Government to take advantage of this most efficient material and to endeavour to give it unity of organisation and unity of efficient training. The Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers are ample in numbers and keen in military spirit. They do not want merely to play at soldiers, but they want to be soldiers and to get the best possible military training within the limits of their remaining civilians, and under the conditions in which it is possible for them to serve. Surely we ought to embrace this opportunity and make their organisation one for the whole of the forces of the second line and give them a systematic training and render them as efficient as possible without making them cease to be civilians. It is no use to endeavour to alter and improve the condition of the Militia in one point, the Yeomanry in another, and the Volunteers in a third. My right hon. friend rightly goes a step further and asks the House and the country to take advantage of this opportunity to give the united forces of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers such training as will make them an efficient defensive force in time of national emergency. Of course, whether we shall succeed or not, or whether the Bill will pass in its present form, remains to be seen. The Government are open, as I have said, to suggestions for the improvement of the scheme so long as they are consistent with the main object they have in view. The fact that this is the object we have in view is recognised, at any rate, outside this House. It has been brought before the country mainly through the energy of my right hon. friend, and I believe the country now understands what the object is and approves of it, and the people are willing to support the Secretary for War in his arduous task as long as they are convinced that he is taking practical means to achieve his object. We have been told in the course of the debate that we are destroying the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers. That is not so; we are endeavouring to treat these three forces as a single body, and of course, if we amalgamate them into a single body they will, to a certain degree, lose their distinctive characteristics. But the efficiency of the whole body will be vastly improved. It has been asked on both sides of the House what relation does this proposal bear to proposals for conscription or compulsory service. There is no element of conscription or compulsory service in our proposals or behind our proposals; our scheme is founded on a voluntary basis. My right hon. friend has rightly said more than once that a volunteer is a volunteer. It is a useful truism to insist upon, that that is the basis on which we found this new departure and new development of our Army system. But there are certain individuals who criticise the scheme more or less favourably, but always with certain reservations. They say they wish well to the ingenious proposals my right hon. friend has placed before the country, and that he may perhaps succeed, but they end by saying that the scheme is foredoomed to failure because it is based on a voluntary system and not on the principle of compulsory service. There is no foundation for the suggestion that the ultimate motive of those who lay these proposals before the House is compulsory service. My right hon. friend over and over again has expressed his wholehearted allegiance to the voluntary principle as the basis of this proposal. It was mentioned, I think by the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division, that it was manifest on the face of it that a system of conscription was one which in many respects would be wholly unsuitable for adoption in this country. The British citizen is a patriotic man, and he is not blind to the interests of national defence or unwilling to undertake his full share of responsibility with regard to it; still he thinks, and he rightly thinks, that the burdens that are put upon his shoulders should be proportioned to his needs and to his risks, and that he should not have imposed upon him burdens which are wholly unnecessary. I do not know that after the speech of my hon. and gallant friend that I need elaborate this point. We have no land frontier like continental countries, and, therefore, our naval line of defence is our first line of defence, on which it is necessary and right for us to bestow our supreme attention. But, more than that, we have military obligations upon us connected with our Empire which render it practically impossible for us to adopt anything like general compulsory service. The first military necessity laid upon us is to see that we have a complete and sufficient force for garrisoning and defending India and our other Imperial possessions over the seas, and for that purpose it is absolutely essential that we should have a large force raised upon the Volunteer basis, and upon no other. That must be a prime necessity of any military organisation of this country, and having that large burden on our shoulders, it is absolutely impossible for us to adopt in addition a general compulsory system with regard to our home defence. This scheme is in no sense what it has been described—the last despairing effort on the part of the advocates of the voluntary system. It is a reasoned attempt to solve a difficult problem on broad lines, and I am certain that, if it fails it will but lead to another attempt on the same voluntary basis, and that the political leaders have not yet come into existence, or, at any rate, into prominence, who will be prepared to advocate anything like a general measure of compulsory service or conscription. I can understand that there may be doubt in certain quarters as to the cost of the scheme. But the Secretary for War has declared his confidence that he will be able to give the country a military force in the Territorial Army more efficient than and for less money than is now spent on the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers. With that statement I entirely agree. I think we have given an earnest of our endeavours to make that plain. We have taken the House into confidence and we have given an earnest of our economical intentions, knowing that it is expected by the House and by the vast majority of the country, so long as any reductions which may be effected can be made without sacrifice of efficiency. We believe that we have succeeded in doing that; and the same idea of economy actuates the proposals we are laying before the House with regard to the expenses of the Territorial Army. My right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean and other speakers have made certain comments on the Statement laid before the House by the Secretary of State a short time ago. We have made a complete Statement of what we believe will be, as far as we can estimate it, the general expenses of running this Territorial Army when it is in operation. There is really no secret in that. In the Memorandum of the Secretary of State there is a statement of the cost of running the Territorial Force when it comes into operation, and he is convinced of the accuracy of the Estimate. Of course there will be considerable expenditure incident to a great change of organisation such as is proposed, but this will be distributed over a certain period of time, and when the scheme comes into operation the cost will be less than that of the corresponding forces on the Estimates now. The figures are not final, and the Government will be ready to consider with an open mind in Committee any suggestions in relation to the third and other clauses of the Bill bearing on the subject. The general grounds upon which I urge the acceptance of the Second Reading of this Bill are, in the first place, that it proceeds upon a voluntary and not a compulsory basis. I think we have made that perfectly clear, and we intend absolutely to adhere to it. In the second place, it proceeds on what we believe to be a sound economical basis, because we are of the opinion that we shall spend less money upon the scheme and get a better return for our expenditure than we are getting now. In the third place, it provides an elastic and not a rigid system. We recognise the spirit in which the Auxiliary Forces have agreed to discharge their defence duties, and this imposes upon the Government the obligation to endeavour in our regulations to meet their needs and necessities, and with this object in view my right hon. friend has made the terms of his Bill elastic, so that it will be in the power of the Army Council to mould these regulations, and alter them according to the exigencies of the various corps and the characteristics of the various classes of citizens who join them, so that we may be able to take full advantage of the best material that is available in the country to develop this force. The Government are justified in noting with satisfaction the reception of the Bill. My right hon. friend has approached the problem with an open, a clear, and a vigorous mind, and has produced a practical scheme. If it continues to meet with the same consideration which it has received this evening, we may hope to pass into law an Act which will place on a secure foundation the defence of our country.

Motion made and Question "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Arnold-Forster,)—put, and agreed to.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

SUPPLY [8th APRIL] REPORT.

Class I.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £43,400, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces."

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £9,100, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for expenditure in respect of Osborne."

3. "That a sum, not exceeding £50,700 be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for expenditure in respect of Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, and for the maintenance of certain Cemetries abroad."

4. "That a sum, not exceeding £427,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for the Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, and Post Office Telegragh Buildings in Great Britain, and certain Post Offices abroad, including Furniture, Fuel, and sundry Miscellaneous Services."

5. "That a sum, not exceeding £313,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, in respect of sundry Public Buildings in Great Britain, not provided for on other Votes."

6. "That a sum, not exceeding £47,400, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for expenditure in respect of Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain."

7. "That a sum, not exceeding £46,600, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for Expenditure in respect of Miscellaneous Legal Buildings."

8. "That a sum, not exceeding £91,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

9. "That a sum, not exceeding £32,400, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for Houses of Parliament Buildings."

10. "That a sum, not exceeding £2,100, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for the execution and erection of a Monument in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter, Westminster, to the memory of the late Right Honourable the Marquess of Salisbury."

First Two Resolutions agreed to.

Third Resolution, "That a sum, not exceeding £50,700 be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for expenditure in respect of Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, and for the maintenance of certain Cemeteries abroad," read a second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) asked the First Commissioner of Works to give some undertaking that the expenditure upon Embassies abroad would be more economical in the future than in the past. He would like some assurance that there would be more economy practised in regard to the erection of buildings in foreign countries.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale) said he hoped the extravagances of the past would facilitate economies in the future.

Resolution agreed to.

Fourth to Seventh Resolutions agreed to.

Eighth Resolution, "That a sum, not exceeding £91,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens," read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. MORTON (Sutherland) said he desired to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of keeping the total cost of works undertaken by his office nearer the original Estimates.

MR. HARCOURT promised that the Estimates in the future would be made upon a closer basis.

And, it being Eleven of the clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Subsequent Resolutions to be considered to-morrow.

Pay by Fire Insurance Companies towards the Upkeep of Fire Brigades.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): To ask Mr. Attorney-General by what Act or Acts London insurance companies are required to pay to the London Fire Brigade the sum of £30 per annum for every million pounds of insurances effected; does this statutory obligation extend outside the area of the London County Council; and, if not, would he consider the possibility of extending this obligation to all the extra Metropolitan districts where efficient fire brigades are established.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) My hon. friend has asked me to answer this Question. By Section 13 of 28 and 29 Vic., cap. 90 (The Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865), companies insuring any property in the Metropolis against fire are required to pay quarterly to the Metropolitan Board of Works (now the London County Council) a contribution towards the expenses of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade at the rate of £35 per annum for every £1,000,000 of the gross amounts insured. Outside the area of the London County Council there is no statutory obligation on fire insurance companies to make any such contribution, except in one or two large towns under the provisions of local Acts; but, in a number of towns and districts, it is the custom of fire-insurance companies to make voluntary payments towards the expenses of dealing with fire. Full information on this subject will be found on page 17 of the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Fire Brigades, 1900 (No. 278, of 1900), which recommended that "all fire insurance companies should be required by law to contribute some proportion of the expenses connected with fire extinction, which is an obligation already recognised by some of the most important companies." I am not, however, prepared, as at present advised, to initiate legislation of the kind suggested.

Battleships, etc., Struck off and Laid Down.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will state, in parallel columns, for each year from 1st January, 1889, to 31st December, 1906, the number of battleships, coast defence vessels, armoured cruisers, protected cruisers, and destroyers laid down, and the number struck off the list of efficient ships, together with the sum total of each class laid down and struck off during the seventeen years, such period being more or less the life of an armoured vessel.

Panama Canal Works—Trinidad Labourers' Contracts.

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, if he will lay upon the Table a copy of the contracts under which Trinidad labourers have been recruited to work on the Panama Canal.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Governor of Trinidad has been requested to supply a copy of the contract for this purpose.

Imprisonment of British Colonists at Nairobi.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Captain Grogan and four other British subjects are now undergoing a sentence of imprisonment at Nairobi, for an offence under the Indian Penal Code; whether the offence complained of consisted in the punishment of some natives for insults offered to white women; whether, in view of the circumstances and of the services rendered by Captain Grogan to East Africa and to this country, the Secretary of State is prepared to advise His Majesty to remit the remainder of the sentence; and when Papers on the subject will be laid upon the Table of the House.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. According to the Secretary of State's present information these men were charged with holding an unlawful meeting and resisting the police. The officer administering the Government reports that the insult was not of a serious nature, and at most did not amount to more than rudeness and disobedience. He further reports that after collecting upwards of 100 Europeans, of whom many were armed, Captain Grogan and the persons acting with him flogged the three natives concerned in a most brutal manner in front of the Court House at Nairobi, in spite of the attempted intervention of the magistrate and a police officer. The natives were not handed over to the police. As at present informed the Secretary of State sees no reason for revising the sentence of the magistrate's court upon Captain Grogan, and he proposes to defer the question of laying Papers on the Table of the House until he has received full details by mail.

European and Native Population at Nairobi.

MR. CAVE: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, what are the approximate numbers of the white and coloured populations in and about Nairobi; what force of white police is now available for the preservation of order in the district; and whether the Secretary of State is satisfied that the force is sufficient for all purposes.

Europeans . . .	350
Eurasians . . .	94
Goanese . . .	295
Indians . . .	1,752
Africans . . .	2,246

but the Secretary of State has no information regarding the numbers in the surrounding districts. Provision for a white police force of twenty non-commissioned officers and men has been made in the Estimates for the current financial year, and the acting Commissioner was authorised by telegram on the 18th of March to raise this force at once. The Commissioner of the Protectorate, who is on leave in this country, has now recommended that the force should be increased to forty non-commissioned officers and men, and the Secretary of State has no doubt that this force will be sufficient to maintain order.

Balances in Hands of Boards of Guardians.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state the total amount of balances in hand and surpluses now in the hands of the guardians of England and Wales over and above that needed for current expenditure.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have no information as to the amount of the balances now in the hands of boards of guardians in England and Wales.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that many boards of guardians in London levy a rate greater than their current expenditure, thus leading to balances in hand and surpluses amounting to many thousands of pounds; and, if so, whether he proposes to take any steps to stop this practice.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am not aware that it is the practice of many boards of guardians in London to call for excessive contributions from the rates, nor have I received any recent complaints on the subject. It must be borne in mind that where the expenditure is large it is necessary that the guardians should have a considerable working balance in hand.

Housing of the Working Classes Bill—Date of Introduction.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he is now in a position to fix a date for the introduction of the Bill for the Improvement of the Housing of the Working Classes promised in the King's Speech.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am desirous of introducing the Bill as early as practicable, but I cannot at present fix a date for the purpose.

Pay of Male Clerical Staff of the Post Office Telephone Service.

SIR J. BAKER (Portsmouth): To ask the Postmaster-General, in view of the fact that the male clerical staff of the general manager of the Post Office London Telephone Service forwarded a memorial in December, 1905, after four years service, asking for better pay and conditions of service, that the Select Committee on Postal Servants was approached and informed the memorialists that their case did not come within its terms of reference, and further that the female staff employed in the same office is already established, and that two years service has been accepted as the basis of establishment of the National Telephone Company's staff when the company is taken over by the Post Office, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the character of the work performed by the memorialists, and take steps for the early provision of an establishment for them, with pay and conditions of service equal to those granted to established officers in the service of the Department for similar work.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The question of placing the male clerical staff of the general manager of the Post Office London Telephone Service on the establishment is now being proceeded with; but the matter requires careful investigation and consideration, and some little time is necessary for the completion of the scheme.

The Police Superannuation Bill.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of certain hardships existing under The Police Act, 1890, the Government will give special facilities to the Police Superannuation Bill now before Parliament.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I cannot promise that special facilities will be given for this Bill.

Wages of Agricultural Labourers.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade whether he can state the last available figures as to the average rate of weekly wages paid to agricultural labourers in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland respectively, with the highest and lowest average weekly earnings in each country.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The latest available figures are contained in the Second Report on Wages and Earnings of Agricultural Labourers [Cd. 2376], and relate to the year 1902, but information furnished to the Department by correspondents from time to time since that year tends to show that, in 1906, wages were generally at about the same level as in 1902. The following figures, extracted from the above-mentioned Report, show, for each division of the United Kingdom, the average weekly earnings of agricultural labourers (including all payments in cash and the value of allowances in kind) in 1902* :—

	England.		Wales.		Scotland.		Ireland.
All classes of agricultural labourers (including ordinary labourers and men in charge of animals) - -	18	3	17	3	19	3	10	11
Ordinary agricultural labourers only -	17	5	17	7	19	5	10	9

In the case of the ordinary agricultural labourers, the following statement shows the highest and lowest county averages in 1902.

* These averages relate to able-bodied male adults. They do not include the earnings of stewards, bailiffs, foremen, or casual labourers.

Accidents to Railway Servants.

SIR F. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been in each year, from the year 1896 to the year 1906, inclusive, the number of railway servants killed by accidents in which the movement of vehicles used exclusively on railways was concerned, the number of instances in which such fatal accidents to railway servants have been investigated by inspectors or sub-inspectors of the Board of Trade, the number of inquests held in respect of such fatal accidents to railway servants, and the number of instances in which the coroner at any such inquest has applied to the Board of Trade for an official assessor at such inquest, in pursuance of Section 8 of The Railways Regulation Act, 1871.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) A statement is attached showing the number of railway servants killed during the period mentioned by my hon. friend by train accidents and other accidents arising from the movement of railway vehicles, the number killed in such accidents as were investigated by the inspecting staff of the Board of Trade, and the number killed in cases in which the coroners holding the inquests asked for the appointment of an assessor. I have no knowledge of the number of inquests held, but it may, I think, be safely assumed that every fatal accident to a railway servant forms the subject of a coroner's inquest, or, in Scotland, of an inquiry by the procurator fiscal.

Year.	Number of railway servants killed in the movement of railway vehicles.	Number killed in accidents into which inquiries were held.	Number killed in cases in which coroners applied for assessors.
1898 - -	504	104	1

Children and Council and Voluntary Schools.

MR. ARMITAGE (Leeds, Central): To ask the President of the Board of Education if he will state the number of places provided in council schools on 31st December, 1906, or the nearest date for which the information is available; the number of children on the register at the same date; the number of average attendances; and if he will give the like information with regard to non-provided schools.

Voluntary schools - -	3,509,914

Sedition of Bombay Newspaper.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the editor and publisher of a Bombay newspaper called the Vihari has been bound over by the Chief Presidency of Bombay to be of good behaviour for six months for publishing an article describing British India as Hell on Earth, and the English as surpassing Nero, Nadir Shah, Tamerlane, and Satan in cruelty, so that their success causes the mercy of God to be doubted in the world; and whether it is the intention of the Government of India to move for a sentence more proportionate to the effect of the publication of such statements among the masses of the Bombay Presidency.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I have seen a report of the case. So far as I am aware, the Government of India do not intend to take any action.

Opium Exported from India.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary of State for India what was the total value of the opium exported from India in 1906, and the value of that consigned direct to ports in China.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The value of the opium exported from India in the year 1906, as shown in the trade returns, was £6,128,016, of which £4,806,452 represents opium consigned direct to Hongkong and the treaty ports in China.

Suggested Increased Allowances for Officers serving in South Africa.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is able to do something to diminish the serious burden placed upon officers by service in South Africa, and whether he can allow the same rate of pay in South Africa as in India.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The question of the alleged inadequacy of the allowances granted to officers serving in South Africa was very fully considered quite recently, and it was decided that there were not sufficient grounds to justify any increase. The difference in the circumstances of officers serving in India and South Africa makes any comparison of their respective emoluments of doubtful value, but I observe that in the junior ranks of the infantry the total amount of pay and allowances is higher in South Africa than in India.

The Sherwood Foresters—Coloured Facings to Uniforms.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that several regiments have been allowed to return to having their old coloured facings on their uniform, permission will also be given to another regiment with a very famous record, the Sherwood Foresters, the old Forty-fifth, again to have green on theirs.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) This proposal was fully considered on the previous recent occasion, and it was held that the application could not be entertained. I am not prepared to reopen the question.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Cost of Naval Construction.

MR. NUTTALL (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty the total estimated cost of the nine battleships and ten armoured cruisers which, as stated in the Navy Estimates, will be completed by 1909; and whether the nine battleships include four ships of the "Dreadnought" type, but exclude the three ships of that type the construction of which it is proposed shall be commenced this year.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The total cost is approximately £29,000,000. The reply to the second part of the Question is in the affirmative.

Cost of H.M.S. "Invincible."

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, why the cost of the "Invincible," as given in the White Paper, Cd. 3048, issued last session, is now increased from £1,736,645 to £1,744,055; and whether he can explain why this vessel building at Elswick is to cost £34,145 more than a sister ship building on the Clyde.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Answer to the first part of the Question is that the lower figure included sums which were not finally determined at the time the estimate was made, whereas the higher figure represents a contract price. As regards the second part, there are slight differences in the arrangement of details of the ships building on the Tyne and Clyde which contribute to a variation in price.

Cost of H.M.S. "Dreadnought."

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in spite of the fact that the "Dreadnought" has been in commission since last October, the Navy Estimates do not present a true account of her cost in that they exclude the cost of her reserve of guns; and whether this practice of excluding the cost of the reserve of guns has been followed in the case of any previous ships.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The reserve of guns provided is calculated upon the total number mounted, and individual guns are not appropriated to particular ships except where only one ship exists with a particular type of gun. The cost of reserve guns is not included in cost of guns shown in the Estimates, and has not been included with previous ships. The Estimates, therefore, give a correct account of the cost of the "Dreadnought."

Battleship Reserve Guns.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the reserve guns of the "Dreadnought" are now ready to be placed on board that vessel; and whether the reserve guns of the "Lord Nelson" and "Agamemnon" are ordered to be completed by the time those vessels are ready, and are included in the cost of the armament of those ships as set forth in the Navy Estimates.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The replies to the first and second parts of the Question are in the affirmative, and to the third part in the negative.

Woolwich Arsenal.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the continued lack of employment at Woolwich in consequence of the Royal Arsenal having to bear the whole, or nearly the whole, of the loss of orders attendant upon the Government declaration to reduce expenditure; and whether, having regard to the fact that 15,000 men have been discharged from the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, during the last four or five years, he can now say whether he will stop any further discharges.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will instruct the Army Council to place such orders with the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, as will obviate the dismissal of the 1,200 men who have received warning of discharge.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): I will answer both Questions together. Yes, Sir, my attention has been drawn to the continued diminution of work at Woolwich referred to by my hon. friend, but the reason is not that stated by him. The reductions are the outcome of general reductions in naval and military expenditure. Except rifle and small arms ammunition, as to which sufficient proportions have been ordered from the ordnance factories to keep the respective shops in work with present staffs, practically all the new orders on Army Votes for articles made in the ordnance factories are being placed with them. The fact is, that there is not work to keep the present staff employed, and further discharges appear to be inevitable. I have, however, postponed the operation of the notices of discharge temporarily in order to mitigate hardships as far as possible, and I am in anxious consultation with the Admiralty as to the possibility of finding further work for this year. There are certain articles which public policy requires us to place in a certain proportion for manufacture by the trade, but it is not any unusual allocation of these articles which has led to the present difficulty.

MR. CROOKS: Will the right hon. Gentleman facilitate the payment of bonuses to the men now in the Arsenal, so that they may get away quickly when opportunity offers, and make vacancies for those who are not successful in getting jobs elsewhere?

MR. HALDANE asked for notice of the Question.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of appointing a small expert Committee to discuss the possibility of employing the plant at these places fully in both peace time and war time.

MR. HALDANE: We have such a Committee now.

Army Bill and the Militia and Volunteer Officers.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the effect of the new Army Bill will be to merge the officers of the Militia and Volunteers into one class, receiving the same allowances and emoluments and undertaking the same duties both as to time and place.

MR. HALDANE: The reply is in the affirmative.

Indian Legislative Councils.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received the Report from the Government of India upon the question referred to them last year of widening the powers and responsibilities of the legislative councils; and whether he can conveniently communicate the Report to the House before the Indian Budget is taken.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): On last Saturday I received a despatch dealing with the subject of my hon. friend's Question; but at present I am not in a position to make a statement or to lay any Papers on the Table of the House. It is a long and important despatch and calls for mature consideration.

MR. SMEATON: Will the right hon. Gentleman enable the House to consider and discuss the Report before he takes a decision upon it?

MR. MORLEY: No, Sir. By all usage, and certainly by all expediency, I must answer that despatch on the responsibility of His Majesty's Government. But I anticipate that before any action is taken the House will have an opportunity of considering the matter.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is in a position to say whether the recommendations contained in the despatch will involve legislation, or whether they can be decided by mere Executive action?

MR. MORLEY: I must ask my hon. friend to excuse me from saying anything on the subject at present.

Native Labour in the Transvaal Mines.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any natives of the British Central Africa Protectorate have been recruited for the Transvaal mines since the departure of those mentioned in the Commissioners Report for 1905–6; and whether such recruiting is still permissible and proceeding.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): Five hundred natives of the British Central Africa Protectorate were recruited for the Premier Diamond Mine during the last recruiting season which ended on the 31st of December; the next season for recruiting commences on the 1st of July; the question whether further recruiting will then be permitted is under the consideration of the Secretary of State.

*MR. REES: Has any occasion arisen for the exercise of the Under-Secretary's promised kind offices on behalf of the Protectorate in connection with the Anglo-Portuguese Labour Convention?

MR. CHURCHILL: I must ask for notice of that Question.

Sir A. Swettenham's Resignation.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): On behalf of the hon. and learned Member for the Walton Division of Liverpool, I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the resignation of the late Governor of Jamaica was occasioned by consideration of age; whether age was assigned by the late Governor as the reason of his retirement; and, if not, on what ground was the resignation officially expressed to be the result of age.

MR. CHURCHILL: The resignation of Sir Alexander Swettenham of his office as Governor of Jamaica was tendered upon 24th January last in a telegram couched in the following words: "Respectfully apply for permission for retirement on account of age, forthwith to be relieved."

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) asked whether the recent unfortunate incidents which took place in Jamaica had any connection with the resignation of Sir Alexander Swettenham.

Mr. CHURCHILL: That is not included in the Question on the Paper. I do not think it would be any advantage at this stage if I were to try to specify the circumstances which were and those which were not connected with the resignation.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): Will the whole of the correspondence be laid on the Table?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I cannot yet say what part of the correspondence may properly be laid. Certainly the whole of the correspondence is not of a character suitable for publication.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: But are we to understand that other causes beside that of age dictated the resolve taken by Sir Alexander Swettenham?

[No Answer was returned.]

Mr. LYTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the correspondence will be laid?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I think the right hon. Gentleman had better put down a Question on that subject. * The correspondence affects other Governments besides our own, and it must be very carefully considered, from every point of view, by the Foreign Office as well as by the Colonial Office, before any decision can be come to in regard to publication.

The Bahr-el-Ghazal.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any official information showing that Congo Free State troops are still occupying four stations in the Bahr-el-Ghazal, and that the Lado enclave is occupied by a force of 1,800 men; and, if so, whether he can explain the reasons which induce the Congo Free State administration to maintain so large a military force within striking distance of British territory.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Runciman, Dewsbury; for Sir Edward Grey): My right hon. friend understands that telegraphic instructions have now been sent to the Congolese Commandant at Lado, ordering the evacuation of all posts in Meridi.

Sale of Revolvers.

Mr. G. H. FABER (Boston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in view of his commutation of the death sentence in a recent case of planned and deliberate murder, he proposes to take any measures to restrict the sale of revolvers to such applicants only as shall have obtained a magistrate's certificate as to the necessity of the purchase.

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Gladstone, Leeds, W.): I am informed that the Pistols Act of 1903 has proved satisfactory in diminishing crime connected with the carrying of pistols, and I do not at present contemplate undertaking its extension or amendment. No possible amendment of the Act would prevent the class of murders which can be described as "planned and deliberate."

St. Pancras Unemployed.

Mr. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how many unemployed in St. Pancras were registered from January 1906 to March 1907 in each month respectively, and how many in each successive month were given employment through the committee; what was the nature of the work given to these men; what requests for money or help were made by the St. Pancras Unemployed Committee to the Local Government Board during the last fifteen months; and what money grants to this body have been made by the Local Government Board during that period.

*The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. John Burns, Battersea): I am informed that the total number of the unemployed registered by the St. Pancras Distress Committee from January 1906 to March 1907 was 2,567. The total number of persons in each month for whom work was provided through the committee was approximately 2,316. Of these 999 were employed on work provided by the borough council, eighty-eight on local work to which the Central (Unemployed) Body contributed, and 1,229 on work provided by that body. I will send my hon. friend a statement showing the particulars for each month. The work provided by the borough council consisted of extra road sweeping, painting lamp-posts, and general labouring work. The local work to which the Central Body contributed consisted of reducing the gradient of a road and laying out gardens. Payments out of the parliamentary grant were in London made not to the Distress Committees, but to the Central (Unemployed) Body, and no request for a payment from the grant was received by the Local Government Board from the St. Pancras Distress Committee.

Leicester Distress Committee.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he would lay upon the Table the letter from the Leicester Distress Committee indicating that the committee required no more money from the Local Government Board.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The letter forms part of a correspondence between the Local Government Board and the Distress Committee, and refers to other portions of that correspondence. It does not seem to me necessary to lay the letter on the Table of the House, but I shall be happy to send my hon. friend a copy of it.

Rifle Ranges for Postal Officials.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the roof of the General Post Office has been converted into a rifle range where postal employees are taught rifle practice; if so, by whose authority a branch of the civil service is being used to assist the military service; whether any alteration has been made in the roof to adapt it to the purposes of a rifle range, and who authorised the alterations to be made; what the alterations cost, and who paid for them; whether any expenses are incurred in teaching the postal youths and employees how to shoot; and, if so, who pays the expenses.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): A miniature rifle range has recently been erected on the roof of the Savings Bank building at West Kensington and another is about to be erected on the roof of the General Post Office North. The space in question is not required for any other purpose. The ranges will be used by Post Office employees in connection with their drill. All expenses in connection with their erection and maintenance are defrayed by the officers concerned, who have formed clubs for the purpose and no cost whatever will fall on public funds. I have every desire to facilitate the formation of such clubs, which are entirely of a civil character and have no connection with military service.

Sharlston Elementary School Teacher.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that Mr. O. B. Milnes has fulfilled his duties as head teacher at the Sharlston elementary school in a most satisfactory manner; that the West Riding education authority have refused to consent to the appointment of Mr. Milnes by the managers of the Royston national school as head teacher to that school on educational grounds; that Mr. Marvin, the inspector sent by the Board of Education, on their being appealed to by the managers to inquire into the circumstances of the case, reported that Mr. Milnes was one of the most deserving of the younger men in his district, and very strongly recommended him for the appointment; and that the Board informed the authority on 30th January, that Mr. Milnes' career, as shown in the reports of His Majesty's Inspectors, presents an unbroken record of success and good deserts under very adverse circumstances, and advised the authority to reconsider their decision: and will he say on what ground or fresh information the Board have, since that time, completely reversed their decision.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The facts are substantially as stated, except that the Board of Education have not reversed any previous decision. Their powers in such cases are limited by the Education Act, 1902, to determining whether the local education authority withheld their consent to the appointment of a teacher on educational grounds. It was clear that the West Riding County Council withheld their consent to Mr. Milnes' appointment on educational grounds, and on finding that the council were not prepared to reconsider their action in the matter, the Board had no alternative under the Statute but to decide accordingly.

Mr. LANE-FOX asked whether the Board of Education had not some option of deciding whether the grounds urged were genuine or not. Was the right hon. Gentleman aware that the grounds alleged were based entirely on a visit lasting only three-quarters of an hour, and on six questions put to particular people? Was it not unfair that a promising teacher should be under the stigma of being inefficient?

Mr. McKENNA: The Board of Education have to satisfy themselves that the decision was come to on educational grounds. There is no shadow of doubt that the decision in the present case was come to on those grounds.

Viscount TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House what the educational grounds were?

Mr. McKENNA: Certainly.

Viscount TURNOUR: Will the right hon. Gentleman do so?

Mr. McKENNA: I do not think that this is the occasion to do that.

Mr. LANE-FOX: Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the teacher has been fairly treated in this matter?

Mr. McKENNA: I do not think I am called upon to express any opinion upon that point.

Molascuit.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he is aware that a new process for using the by-products of the sugar-cane, called molascuit, has been recently devoloped, and that it can be imported and sold at a price to be of considerable advantage both to the British stock feeder and the Colonial sugar-cane grower; and will he take steps to bring this product before the agriculturists in this country by drawing attention to it through the Board's publications.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): Our attention has been directed to the feeding-stuff to which my hon. friend refers, but we do not see our way to call special attention to it in our publications. It will doubtless be brought to the notice of stockowners through the usual channels.

Labourers' Cottages in County Down.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Down, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what was the Exchequer grant for the purpose of the Labourers Acts made to county Down for the financial year ending in 1906; and what will be the corresponding grant of the same county under the Labourers Act of 1906 for 1907–8.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): The share of the county Down for the financial year ended 31st March, 1906, was £2,010. Its share for the year 1907–8 on the basis of distribution established by the Labourers Act of last session will be, approximately, £297. The alteration of the method of distribution was, as I have already explained, made for the purpose of securing an equitable allocation of the grant amongst the several rural districts in which cottages have been provided. It was manifestly unfair that county Down should receive £2,010 in respect of 235 cottages, or about £8 11s. 0d. per cottage, while county Limerick, for example, received only £1,553 for 2,647 cottages, or about 11s. 9d. per cottage. Under the new system all districts will be paid out of the grant at a uniform rate of £1 8s. 8d. per cottage for every cottage provided before the 1st November, 1906.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: Is the right hon. Gentleman of opinion that this change in the law in reference to the grant is likely to facilitate the building of cottages in county Down?

*Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question as to a matter of opinion and is not in order.

The Drainage of the Barrow.

MR. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the medical evidence given before the Barrow Drainage Commission in 1885 by William Neale, M.D., medical officer, Mountmellick dispensary district, to the effect that houses were annually rendered unfit for habitation, and whole families had to leave in flood times and were huddled together in most unsanitary houses, public health seriously injured, malaria and typhoid fever and diphtheria prevalent in consequence of the floods, and that no adequate sewerage for the town was possible, and the water supply was contaminated; and whether, having regard to the fact that the evils arising from the flooding have increased since this evidence was given twenty-two years ago, he will take steps to provide an effectual remedy.

The following Questions on the same subject also appeared on the Paper—

MR. MEEHAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Arterial Drainage Commission, dated 23rd February 1907, in which it is stated, pages 9 and 10, that for fifty years the state of the Barrow has been the subject of acute complaint, that nothing save the making of maps, plans and estimates has yet been done by the State or by any combination of owners towards curing or even mitigating the evils complained of, whilst they had abundant testimony that the flooding and consequent injury grow greater year by year, that the case of this river basin differs from others in Ireland, once similarly circumstanced, in that no expenditure by the State has ever taken place, although the task of clearing the main outfall is manifestly far beyond the reach of private enterprise, and that they therefore feel that the case of the Barrow calls for exceptional and early treatment, and the existence of surveys, maps and plans already referred to removes the difficulty that might otherwise exist in taking such action; and whether, in view of this declaration, he will provide an immediate remedy.

MR. MEEHAN: To ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the medical evidence given before the Barrow Drainage Commission, 1885, by Sir Francis P. M'Cabe, M.D., F.R.C.S.I., Local Government Board inspector, to the effect that the result of the flooding over an estimated area of 3,400 square miles was most injurious to the public health of the country, developed constitutional diseases, pulmonary phthisis, bronchial and catarrhal affections, acute and chronic rheumatism, and predisposed to lunacy, enteric and typhus fever, bog-lameness and chronic rheumatism in cattle, and fluke or liver rot in sheep; and, seeing that these evils have been in existence over fifty years and have increased since this evidence was given twenty-two years ago, whether he will provide any remedy.

MR. MEEHAN: To ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been to the Report of a Committee consisting of the Parliamentary and local representatives of Kildare, Carlow, King's and Queen's counties, formed to promote the drainage of the River Barrow, which Report was forwarded to him on the 16th June 1906; whether he is aware that in the Report of the Arterial Drainage Commission, dated 23rd February 1907, it is stated in reference to the Barrow that this river basin differs from others in Ireland, once similarly circumstanced, in that no expenditure by the State has ever taken place, although the task of clearing the main outfall is manifestly beyond private enterprise, and that the case of the Barrow calls for exceptional and early treatment; and whether he will provide the £50,000 asked for by the Committee.

MR. BIRRELL: I will answer all these Questions together. I regret that I can only repeat the Answer which I gave on 20th March to the hon. Member's previous Questions on this subject.† As he is aware, the Arterial Drainage Commission has only recently reported. The Appendix containing the evidence has not yet been presented to Parliament. It is, however, in the printer's hands and will shortly be ready. When the evidence has been received it will be necessary to consider the recommendations of the Commission as a whole in order to decide what legislation may be necessary, and this will take time. It is obvious that in the meantime it will not be possible or desirable to consider the question of undertaking a drainage scheme for the Barrow or any other particular river.

† See (4) Debates, clxxi., 823–6.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that no fewer than three Commissions have supported this recommendation, and cannot he do something to remedy the present state of things?

Mr. BIRRELL: I am not denying the importance of the question or that the Commissions have reported as stated. But the question is of such importance and involves so much expenditure that obviously I must take time to consider my decision.

Keelnabrack School.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in allocating the new building grant, regard will be had for the necessity of building a new school at Curraheen, Glenbeigh, in place of the existing Keelnabrack school, which has been reported as unsafe and unsuitable.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that, in allocating the funds to be placed at their disposal for the erection and improvement of vested school-houses, they will consider the case of the proposed new school in question on its merits, having due regards to the funds available and to the claims of other urgent cases.

Glencar Potato Crop Failure.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the people of Glencar, county Kerry, applied for a free grant of seed potatoes from the Department of Agriculture owing to the partial failure of the potato crop in some townlands and the complete failure in other townlands; and can he say why they were refused subsequently seed potatoes, seed oats, lime, and manure under the same conditions as were granted in the neighbouring parish of Glenbeigh, in view of the fact that Glencar is not so favourably situated for procuring sand and seaweed.

Mr. BIRRELL: It does not fall within the province ef the Department of Agriculture to make free grants of seed potatoes. The Department have made arrangements for establishing demonstration plots in some of the congested districts, including the district of Killorglin, and in this connection small quantities of seed potatoes, seed oats, lime, and manure have been sold to certain persons in the latter district. The objects of these plots is to demonstrate the advantages of change of seed, and the use of lime and artificial manures. The Department have found it impossible owing to the limited funds at their disposal, to arrange for demonstration plots this year at Glencar. The question of extending these operations to other districts next year will receive consideration in due course.

Mr. Packenham's Mullingar Estate.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners are aware that Mr. E. M. Packenham, owner of an estate in the Mullingar rural district, comprising 1,900 acres of untenanted and non-residential land surrounded by uneconomic holdings, is now attempting, by selling the latter and retaining the former, to perpetuate the condition of things which Parliament desires to relieve; and whether, in view of the number of industious young men obliged to emigrate from that district every year for want of land, the Commissioners will, in exercise of their statutory powers, refuse to sanction the sale of any part of this estate unless the whole is offered for sale and a map of the whole is furnished to them.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners are not aware of the facts alleged in the Question. The Commissioners have, with the owner's consent, arranged to have a preliminary inspection made of some 2,700 acres of untenanted land in the districts of Delvin and Mullingar, with a view to considering the question of purchasing it. The inspection will be made as soon as possible.

Evicted Tenants' Bill and Future Tenants.

Mr. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in preparing the promised Evicted Tenants Bill, he has considered the claims of the number of persons who have been technically evicted under Section 7 of the Land Law Act of 1887, and who are now future tenants, precluded from having judicial rents fixed except with the unobtainable permission of their landlords; and whether he will embody in the Bill any provision for opening the courts to those people.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government have no record of the number of persons served with eviction notices under the section quoted who are now future tenants. I am not prepared to make any statement as to the possibility or desirability of extending to future tenants the fair rent provisions of the Land Acts.

General Fetherstonhaugh's Estate.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the date upon which the Estates Commissioners received a memorial praying them to purchase, for distribution among necessitous people, General Richard Fetherstonhaugh's evicted and untenanted lands; the dates upon which the Commissioners communicated with that owner on the subject; the nature of his replies, if any; and whether there is any prospect of the lands in question, or any of the evicted lands belonging to that owner, being acquired for distribution.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners received memorials from the tenants in question on 12th January, 1906, and 21st November, 1906. As the first memorial stated that the property was being sold, the Commissioners took no steps, expecting that the matter would come before them in the ordinary course. As no proceedings for the sale of the estate were instituted before the Commissioners, they wrote to the owner on 2nd November inquiring whether he was prepared to sell his estate, but received no reply. They again wrote to him on 5th March, but so far without result.

Crannagh Farm Boycott.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that on 18th March the Ballina Board of Guardians passed a boycotting resolution in reference to the tenants upon the Crannagh farm, and that on 1st April the same body made it a condition of the appointment of Dr. Isaac Clarke as temporary medical officer to the local dispensary district that he should use his influence to induce his uncle to relinquish his tenancy of the Crannagh farm; and whether he proposes to take any action in reference to this matter.

MR. BIRRELL: The guardian's minutes of 18th March do not contain any resolution of the nature referred to in the Question, and I have no information that any such resolution was passed. The Local Government Board have no official knowledge that the condition alluded to was made by the guardians when appointing Dr. Clarke. The question of sanctioning Dr. Clarke's appointment is at present under the consideration of the Local Government Board.

United Irish League and Gore Booth Estate Tenant.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Edward Layng has yielded up his holding on the Gore-Booth estate, Streamstown, as ordered by the Mullinabreena branch of the United Irish League; and whether the Estates Commissioners obeyed the demand of the same authority to send an official to take possession of the holding and pay Edward Layng the sum of £190 as agreed upon.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have no information as to the communications, if any, which may have passed between Edward Layng and the local branch of the United Irish League, nor have the Commissioners acted in the matter in obedience to any demand of that organisation. The Commissioners, at the desire of all the parties, including the landlord, endeavoured to effect an amicable settlement of the case and to reinstate John Quinn, the evicted tenant, and in this they have succeeded. Layng has been paid a sum of £190 as compensation for surrendering the holding.

MR. LONSDALE: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to a paragraph in the Sligo Champion in which it is stated that the following resolutions were unanimously passed at a meeting of the Mullinabreena branch of the United Irish League—"That with reference to the evicted holding of John Quinn on the Gore-Booth estate, Streamstown, county Sligo, we call on the Estates Commissioners to send an official here to take up possession of the evicted holding and pay the present occupier (Edward Layng) the sum of £190 in cash as already agreed upon." "That having the correspondence in reference to re-instatement of John Quinn before us, and knowing as we do the unreliability of Edward Layng's word, we hereby declare that nothing but the immediate surrender of John Quinn's holding by Edward Layng will satisfy this League, and as the Estates Commissioners are quite willing to pay him the £190 compensation any day he gives up possession we demand that Mr. Layng give up possession on the 1st March, and we call on the people to take note of this resolution."

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I rise to order. If I am not mistaken it has been the practice at the Table to refuse to allow Questions to be put on the Paper asking if a Minister's attention has been directed to a statement in a newspaper, and then quoting that statement. Is it not equally out of order to quote newspaper statements in like manner in a supplementary Question?

MR. LONSDALE: My Question is if the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been directed to an order issued by the United Irish League.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was quoting from a newspaper, and newspaper quotations are not allowed to appear in Questions on the Paper; presumably, therefore, they are not in order in supplementary Questions.

MR. LONSDALE: But this resolution was passed by the branch.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member began by asking if the attention of the right hon. Gentleman had been directed to a statement in a newspaper, which he proceeded to read. That is not in order.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that one of his colleagues has joined the United Irish League?

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not arise out of the Question.

Irish Poor Law Administration.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether His Majesty's Government have any intention of submitting proposals to Parliament for the reform of Poor Law administration in Ireland on the lines of the recommendations of the Viceregal Commission.

MR. BIRRELL: I beg to refer to the Answer which I gave to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for North Kilkenny on 5th March.†

Crannagh Farm Boycott.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a boycott has been instituted against the tenants of the Crannagh farm, in county Mayo, who have refused to give up their holdings at the bidding of the United Irish League; whether these persons are refused the necessaries of life by shopkeepers, prevented by crowds from working upon the holdings for which they are paying rent, and have been prevented from attending Mass at the Ardagh Roman Catholic Church; and what steps have been taken to protect these persons in the exercise of their lawful rights.

MR. BIRRELL: The police authorities inform me that the persons in question have not been boycotted or prevented from working upon their holdings. It is, however, the fact that public feeling has been manifested against them, and the police are informed that on one occasion three of the tenants were prevented from attending Mass. The police have afforded full protection to the persons concerned, five men being employed on the duty. A police hut is in course of erection at the spot.

MR. LONSDALE: Has the right hon. Gentleman any information that twelve tenants under stress of the boycott have served notice to surrender their holdings, and that at a meeting held on Easter Sunday it was decided to pursue the campaign of boycotting until the remaining tenants are forced into submission?

MR. BIRRELL: I have no information as to that.

MR. BIRRELL: Yes.

Protestant Children in Catholic Schools.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the new rule issued by the Commissioners of National Education requiring that in schools under Protestant management, where a substantial minority of the children belong to one religious denomination, an assistant teacher of the denomination of the minority shall be appointed if the average attendance permits; why has this rule been made applicable only to schools under Protestant management; and whether it is intended to apply it to all national schools in Ireland without distinction of creed.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education have furnished me with a copy of the new rule referred to, which provides that in schools under Protestant management in which a substantial majority of the pupils belong to one religious denomination the principal teacher should be of that denomination, and that when a substantial minority of the children belong to another religious denomination an assistant teacher of that denomination should be appointed, if the average attendance permits. Having regard to the comparatively small number of schools under Roman Catholic management in which there is a substantial minority of Protestant pupils, the Commissioners do not consider the arrangement to be feasible in the case of such schools. The aim of the Commissioners in making the rule has been to remove, as far as possible, the obstacles to the education in common schools of all denominations of Protestants, so that, so far at least as these schools are concerned, the fundamental principle of the national system may be carried out.

MR. LONSDALE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are many schools in Ireland under Roman Catholic management which are attended by a considerable minority of Protestant children? Are they to be allowed a teacher of their own faith?

MR. BIRRELL: As far as I can make out the number of Protestant children attending Catholic schools is too small to permit of the rule being applied.

Elphin Disturbances.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has any information respecting the agrarian disturbances at Elphin, county Roscommon, on Easter Sunday and Monday; and whether he will state the number of police now in the district engaged in protecting the lives and property of persons who have been denounced by the United Irish League.

MR. BIRRELL: On Sunday, 31st March, a large crowd accompanied by bands assembled at Elphin with the intention, as previously announced, of demonstrating in the vicinity of local grazing farms. An extra force of seventy police was drafted into Elphin with the object of preserving the peace on the occasion, and this force prevented the crowd from approaching the grazing farms. The force remained on duty at Elphin on the following day, but no further demonstration took place. The police force at Elphin station has been temporarily strengthened by the addition of six men from neighbouring stations, and a further force will be brought to the district if necessary.

Irish Local Government Officials.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that of the forty-seven nominated officials in the Local Government Board (Ireland) thirteen are Catholics, whose salaries aggregate £7,550, whilst the remaining thirty-four are mainly Episcopalians, whose salaries aggregate £22,225; whether he is aware that similar complaints are made about nearly all Government Departments in Ireland; and whether he can take steps, by limiting the right of nomination or otherwise, to terminate the evil of religious ascendancy in such departments.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Local Government Board have no record of the religious persuasion of members of their staff. As regards the concluding part of the Question, I can only assure the hon. Member that fitness for any given post, and not religious denomination, will be the test applied by His Majesty's Government in making appointments in Ireland.

Hillsborough Labourers' Cottage Rents.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the fact that the Hillsborough Rural District Council, West County Down, has decided to raise the rents of the labourers' cottages in their area; that the chairman and the rent collector warned the council that the result would be to empty the cottages, and that the councillor who proposed the increase replied that that was the very thing they wanted to do; whether the Local Government Board will refuse to sanction this resolution; and whether the Board will at the same time take steps to compel the council to consider the representations for further cottages, having regard to the declarations of the councillors that they will not build any more cottages.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Local Government Board are aware that the facts are substantially as stated in the Question. Under Section 29 of the Act of last session the rural district council is required to make regulations dealing, amongst other things, with the rents to be charged for labourers' cottages, and such regulations do not come into force until confirmed by the Local Government Board. No regulations have yet been received from the rural district council in question. A special meeting of the council is to be held on 6th May for the purpose of considering all representations for labourers' cottages which they have received.

Barnmeen School House.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the condition of the schoolhouse at Barnmeen, county Down, and to the fact that no less than four inspectors of the National Board have reported it to be old, unsuitable, badly lighted, and imperfectly ventilated; whether he is aware that the only means of ventilation is by the door, that the window frames are decayed and will not hold the glass, that the structure is built partly of clay, and that the eyesight and general health of the children has been impaired; whether he is aware that the manager of the school, Reverend T. Gallery, P.P., has been endeavouring for years to have a new school provided near to the present school, but that the Commissioners of National Education have refused to sanction the building of a new school on the only site available in the whole district; and whether, having regard to the opinion of the people of the neighbourhood, and to the interests of the children and of education, he will advise the Board to waive its objection as to the new site being within the proscribed distance from another school.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that their inspectors have reported that the existing schoolhouse at Barnmeen is unsuitable for school purposes, and the Commissioners are satisfied that steps ought to be taken to provide suitable accommodation. They are, however, precluded by their rules from making a grant, except in special circumstances, towards the erection of a new schoolhouse when there is a vested school within three miles of the proposed new school. In the present case there are two vested schools under the same manager within one and three-quarter miles of Barnmeen. In these circumstances the Commissioners have felt obliged to refuse the manager's application for a grant, and they see no sufficient reason for departing from that decision, more especially as there are a large number of cases to be dealt with and the available funds are limited.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this rule as to the three-mile limit has only lately been introduced? Is he aware also that there is no other site available for the school?

Mr. BIRRELL: I will make inquiry.

Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin.

MR. MEEHAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury have received a memorial from the staff of the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin, complaining of the increase of work, and asking for an increase of salary in consequence of increased duties; whether the memorial has been considered; if not, when is it likely to be dealt with; whether he is aware that dissatisfaction prevails amongst the staff; and whether they will receive an increase of salary for the extra duties performed.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The memorial referred to has now been received, and is under consideration. I am not at present in a position to make any statement on the subject.

Irish Board of Works Staff.

MR. MACVEAGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state if at any time subsequent to the appointment of Mr. Williams as Secretary of the Board of Works in Ireland any correspondence passed between him and the Civil Service Commissioners with reference to the religious opinions of clerks appointed to the Board of Works; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table a copy of the correspondence.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Civil Service Commissioners inform me that they know nothing of any such correspondence.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): May I ask the Minister in charge what business it is intended to take to-morrow?

MR. MORLEY said it was proposed to take further discussion of the Rules of Procedure.

MR. BALFOUR: I do not suppose there is any possibility of finishing the debate on the Army Bill to-night. That is clearly out of the question, but may I ask if it is intended to divide the discussion on the Second Reading of the Bill, and in the interim to take Procedure Rules de die in diem until they are concluded?

MR. MORLEY: I understand the discussion on the Procedure Rules will be completed to-morrow. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will defer the remainder of his Question until the Prime Minister returns.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR desired to know when it was intended to proceed with the proposal in reference to the House of Lords.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure (in respect of the Education (Provision of Meals) (Scotland) Bill): The Lord Advocate; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the Education (Provision of Meals) Scotland) Bill): Mr. Solicitor-General for Scotland.

Report to lie upon the Table.

TERRITORIAL AND RESERVE FORCES BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [9th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the forces of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for Home defence or prompt support for the regular Army in the field,'"—(Mr. Wyndham)—instead thereof—

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): I propose to support the Amendment put forward by my right hon. friend. It would be a very great pleasure to me and to many other hon. Members on this side of the House if we could accede to the appeal made yesterday by the hon. and gallant Member for Monmouthshire. I can truly say that upon naval and military questions I have never taken Party line; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman, in the circumstances, asks a little too much. I should like to recall to him the circumstances of the case under which he makes this appeal. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said most truly that the Secretary for War had in all his dealings with the Opposition shown invariable courtesy. This I fully recognise; but courtesy is not all that is desired. The right hon. Gentleman has accompanied that courtesy by doing all that in him lay to destroy work done, or attempted, by some of us on this side of the House. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs very properly, I daresay from his own point of view, drew a picture, or rather made suggestions, as to what the Secretary for War might have said regarding the iniquities and infirmities of his predecessors. I am not going to dwell upon that. But what I want to point out is that this is part of the regular stage background upon which this Bill is introduced. It is part of the business to show that order has been restored where chaos was found. It was represented that the right hon. Gentleman found the Army in a state of chaos and dissolution and that he has come forth as its saviour aud restored it to its pristine virtue. The fact is, however, that the right hon. Gentleman himself has borne testimony to the condition of the Army as never having been so good as when he took office. I venture to assert that there is not an officer who will not say that two years ago the Army was better manned, better armed, better trained, better equipped, than it had ever been before. The Volunteers two years ago had 175,000 men in camp, and if the right hon. Gentleman had not interfered they would eighteen months ago have been doing exactly that which he is now hoping they will do in the future; they would have been enjoying the advantage of a fortnight in camp, and the experiment with regard to Volunteer Artillery would not be a question for the future, but a matter of experience to look back upon. I only say these things because I am anxious to dissipate the idea that there has been a waving of the wand by which the reign of order has replaced a state of chaos.

The Secretary for War appealed for plenty of time, free from criticism and interference, wherein to formulate his policy, and everybody on this side of the House felt that it was a fair appeal, and it was responded to. But what has happened? Eighteen months have passed and we have had speeches innumerable from the right hon. Gentleman—the air has been ringing with his eloquence. What has been done? Absolutely nothing at all, except that a large part of the Army has been rendered less effective for war. The Romans, when they wished to inflict a disabling blow coupled with indelible disgrace upon an enemy, used to practise decimation, and the right hon. Gentleman has very nearly succeeded in decimating the Regular Army; already he has succeeded in knocking 20,000 men off the Regular force. [MINISTERIAL cheers.] I am glad to have the accuracy of this statement confirmed. That, we are told, is a beginning only; and when I speak of the Regular Army I mean men serving with the colours only. I can quite understand that there are some who think this a meritorious act, but it does not go far towards strengthening the Army. What I wish to point out is that, so far as accomplishment goes, there has been nothing but destruction, nothing in the way of construction but promises, hopes, and anticipations in regard to the future.

My objections to the Bill can be summed up in a very few words; I believe it involves a policy of make-believe from beginning to end—a make-believe of which the real authors are very well aware. The Secretary of State astonished some of us when he told the House that he had not been able yet to ascertain what were the real military needs of the Empire. I think that was rather an astonishing statement, for I thought we had during the last five or six years made some progress towards arriving at a conclusion upon this all-important matter, and it causes a shock now to find proposals made without any calculation, any hypothesis, arrived at upon this all-important question. Some of us at any rate had formulated ideas on the subject. We thought—rightly or wrongly—that the principal duties of the Government in relation to the two great services were to furnish a Navy beyond challenge, to provide an Army capable of fighting abroad, to provide a striking force to move prior to mobilisation to create a great power of expansion, and in addition we thought it was necessary, even after taking into consideration the strength of the Navy, to have an efficient force to meet and defeat any raid that might be made on the shores of this country. Now, it is only the last of the requirements that the right hon. Gentleman has attempted to fulfil. Fortunately, the Navy is outside the right hon. Gentleman's dispensation; but when we come to the expeditionary force, I venture to suggest that the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean and the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division may set their minds at rest. They need not be in the least alarmed at the prospect of a gigantic expeditionary force of 160,000 men; it is but a spectral force, it does not exist, and will not exist, and nothing the House is asked to do will call it into existence; it is no more a reality than the spectral force that "beleaguered the walls of Prague." I do not believe that the formation of such a force is a prime necessity of our military constitution, but I do believe the power to keep such a force in the field by expansion by trained men is a military necessity of the first order. In this matter the right hon. Baronet may possess his soul in peace, because this is a visionary force which has no existence now, and, as far as anything the House is going to be asked to do, is not to have any existence whatever in the future.

I will not trouble the House with any reference to the striking force. It is condemned by every military authority with whom I have discussed it. The striking force of 5,000 sixpenny Reservists has been condemned by every soldier I know of.

Some words fell from the Financial Secretary to the War Office last night that require notice. The Bill, he said—and I think he said it with the wisdom of the serpent—was exclusively concerned with what have hitherto been called the Auxiliary Forces. That is exactly what the right hon. Gentleman wants the House and the country to think, and if that were all, the interest I take in the Bill would be very different from what it is. So far as the Auxiliary Forces go the Bill practically makes no difference at all. When all is said and done, and if the Bill passed to-morrow, the difference would be so slight as to be scarcely observable. But the Bill touches greatly, intimately, and most dangerously, not the Regular Forces only, but the quasi-Regular Forces which hitherto have supported the Army in the field. I do not wonder that the Financial Secretary was anxious to divert attention from that aspect of the Bill; but I am anxious that attention should be called to it because it is a most important question. For 840 years this country has been fighting year in and year out abroad. The bones of British soldiers lie in every land from the shores of the Baltic to Torres Strait, from Pekin to the Red River. There is only one part of the world's surface where such relics of war are not to be found, and that is the soil of England. Have we no right to learn something from the history of the past? That history tells us that whereas we have had, in order to build up our Empire and to safeguard and protect our industries, to sacrifice blood and treasure in every part of the inhabited world except this England in which we live, we have never yet had to undertake a serious war to repel an invasion of this country. The conclusion I draw from this fact is the simple one that as things have been, so it is probable they will remain. The high probability is that the lessons of the past will serve us in framing our anticipations of the future; and I believe that if ever there was a time when we were justified in forming that conclusion it is the present time, when we have done so much to strengthen our power at sea. At any rate I think I am not unreasonable in asking hon. Members to attach importance first of all to that weapon on which alone we have ever had to rely in the whole of our long history. It is that weapon which the right hon. Gentleman is trying to blunt, but which I desire to keep clear and bright for all emergencies. That weapon is being blunted to an extent which the country does not appreciate at all, and much of that process is to be effected within the four corners of this Bill. The right hon.

Gentleman the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said—and with much that he said on this point I agree—that what we want in order to reinforce the Army in time of war is cadres. How is it that when we want cadres our first effort is to destroy ten of the units we already possess? The Government know perfectly well where the real crux of this question lies, and that is why they have been so very careful to cover up their tracks, if I may use that expression. It is absolutely wrong to say, as was said by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, that fewer recruits will be required under the new policy. It has been stated that under the previous arrangement 31,000 recruits have been required for the Infantry, 12,000 for long-service, and 19,000 for short-service. How many are required now? You require 22,000 long-service recruits and 13,000 short-service recruits, or 35,000 altogether under the new system. The right hon. Gentleman has told us we are going to have a stronger Reserve than we have ever had; and in order to make people accept that statement he has taken a very strong course indeed. It was necessary that he should try to create that impression. He has destroyed or is destroying the Militia, which with all its faults, and they are many, has at any rate done something to give us a substitute for a Reserve, and has set free Regular troops in time of war. He has reduced the number of cadres, the artillery, and the establishment of the cadres, and therefore it is natural to suppose that the available force after these reductions will be less than it was before. In order to dissipate that very natural belief, he has given the House the Return entitled "Army Reserve, Actuarial Calculation of the Normal Strength," etc. I challenge that Return. I say that it is not worth the paper it is printed on. Every line of it is calculated to mislead, and has misled. Prima facie the Return is absurd. What does it start out to prove? We have diminished the Army by ten cadres of infantry; we have reduced every battalion of infantry by eighty men as compared with 1890, by thirty men as compared with last year.

MR. HALDANE: Establishment?

MR ARNOLD-FORSTER: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to make a distinction between establishment and strength? If so, he will make his case worse, not better. After the reductions made and the increase of the term of service for the whole Army, the right hon. Gentleman asks us to believe that the Reserve will not only be as great, but greater than it was before. How carelessly these things are presented to the House! My right hon. friend the Member for Dover asked the natural question how is it, if this reduced establishment is to produce this large Reserve, that even now, after a long period of enlistment for short-service, we have a smaller number of men? We are told that we are to have a Reserve of 115,000 men, recently magnified to 121,000 by some stroke of the pen, and my right hon. friend asked how was it that now we had only got 113,000 men. The right hon. Gentleman said that the explanation was that fourteen recently created battalions have not produced their normal reserve. As a matter of fact these battalions have all been in existence for seven or eight years, and under normal conditions they would have produced their seven years reserve. But the conditions were not normal. During five of these years there have been men pouring into the Reserve on a three and even on a two years enlistment. But there is a much stronger point than that. The regiments have produced much more than their usual reserve, and it would have been well if the right hon. Gentleman had looked at the Return before making his explanation. The Return shows that so far from there being a falling off in the Infantry Reserve, the Infantry Reserve is now 7,000 men more than the calculated Infantry Reserve under the new scheme. And yet he coolly accounts for the number of the Reserve by this imaginary diminution. There will be a great diminution in the calculated Infantry Reserve. I have gone through this Return and others have gone through it also, and I venture to state that if we were to say that we shall get 90,000 men as the available Reserve product of this new scheme we should be very much nearer the mark than this figure of 115,000. The whole of this calculation has been deduced, not from strength, but from establishment. The right hon. Gentleman has told us himself that this year there are 9,000 more men going out of the Army than coming into it. And next year there will be 13,000 more going out than will come in. I want to know the right hon. Gentleman's authority for his calculations.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. HALDANE, Haddington): The right hon. Gentleman asks me a question. The authorities were the best actuaries at the War Office. The Return have been prepared on the most skilled advice.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Very well, the right hon. Gentleman says his calculations are based on the most skilled advice. I have in my hand a Return drawn up two years ago in the War Office for the information of the Army Council, and I should like to tell the right hon. Gentleman under what conditions the Return was drawn up. The question was asked what would be the normal Reserve of the Army on a given establishment. At that time the Army was larger by eight battalions than it is now, every battalion having a larger establishment of strength than is the case at present. What was the result? That larger establishment and larger number of battalions was there stated to give a Reserve of 7,000 less than the Reserve of the right hon. Gentleman. I look upon this actuarial calculation, and I see the name of "J. G. Ashley," the identical actuary whom the right hon. Gentleman claims as supporting this Return.

*MR. HALDANE: Nine years and three are the terms of enlistment.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: That is one of the casual interruptions of the Secretary of State for War. He is in error. The question answered in the Return to which I have referred is "What, with a system of seven years enlistment, will be the number of men in the home battalions unavailable on mobilisation, and what numbers will be available from the Reserve?"

*MR. HALDANE: The home battalions?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The right hon. Gentleman need not interrupt me. Given an establishment for home battalions of 750, the strength of the Reserve is shown in the answer as for sections A and B, 40,000 in round numbers, and for section D, 15,000, total 55,000, the establishments being fifty-two battalions in India, twenty-five in the Colonies, and seventy-nine battalions at home of 800 non-commissioned officers and men. There is no getting out of that.

*MR. HALDANE: Seventy-nine battalions?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Yes, eight more than we have got now. I challenge this Return, it is impossible to have this Reserve. And I will go further. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that we are to have an additional Reserve for the Regular Army. I want the House to understand exactly what this additional Reserve is going to be. It is to be made up of boys now going into the Militia, boys who enlist at seventeen. They are to have six months training in the depot, they are to get 6d. a day in their pockets, and at the end of one year, or two years, or two and a half years, they are to be brought back and made the first-class Reservists of the British Army. I have seen these boys, and if I could take hon. Members down and show them these boys, as I have seen them, stopped in their gymnastic rounds because they had not the strength to go through them, I think we should not hear so much of this great addition to the strength of the British Army. Two out of every three of these boys are useless; they fall by the wayside and die out. The remaining one survives; he goes campaigning in India; he bivouacks; he is fed, and clothed and he survives, and at the end of seven years becomes a Reservist. I saw the Devon Regiment mobilised for the South African war. It consisted of 1,000 men, 500 of whom were Reservists. They occupied, I am told, more lateral space than any other battalion in the British Army. There was not a man who did not know his colonel, his officers and his non-commissioned officers. Such are the present Reservists of the British Army. What is the substitute? These boys, cast adrift at seventeen and a half, and for a year in nearly all cases, and in some cases for two years, absolutely useless either to God or man. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] Well, I withdraw that remark; I used the expression colloquially. But, at any rate, for any military purpose these boys are useless. They cannot be called out for service at home and they are not allowed to be used for service abroad; but at the end of two-and-a-half years they will be called out as first-class Reservists of the British Army. I read lately an article—I do not speak as to the accuracy of it, but I can testify to the ability of the writer—in which it was stated that we are not to be discouraged because the second line of the Army is not equal to the first, and the writer said: "No second line can take the field. Look at the second line of the German Army." The House is often misled on this subject. The second line of the German Army is composed of men of thirty-five years of age and upwards. Every one of them serves two years under the most severe discipline in the world, is commanded by officers of immense experience, and is utilised, if necessary, in that enormous chain of fortresses which rings the German Empire. Is it reasonable, is it common sense to compare these men with such a second line as this of the right hon. Gentleman? I say it is not.

Then there is the utter failure to provide for the great want of the Army—that is officers. Here I must complain again that the House is not properly informed. We were told that officers were to be taken from the public schools and the Universities. We were told that these young gentleman from the Univerities were everything that was to be desired, because they were to be trained on the same method as that in use in the German Army and were attached a la suite of a regiment. The House thought that was a very good thing; but let me explain where the analogy fails. If these boys have served in their public school corps—not a very high form of training, I think—four months are to be knocked off; if they joined their University corps, four months more are to be knocked off, and they are to be attached to a line battalion and to be a la suite for four months only. They will mess with the battalion and try very hard to do somebody else's work while somebody else tries to prevent them from doing it. The second line of the German Army is officered to a considerable extent by men who have been a la suite of a regiment. If a boy passes his final examination in the schools and shows educational and social qualifications, he is permitted, as a one year volunteer, to join a regiment. The only thing to distinguish him is that he wears a white thread in his collar and is allowed to live in lodgings. At the end of the year, if physically, socially, and intellectually fit, he is permitted to serve one year a la suite of a regiment as a subaltern officer, under the sternest discipline the world affords, and at the end of that time, if still regarded as qualified, he is permitted to serve as Under-Lieutenant in the Landwehr. And some German papers complain that officers with that amount of training and discipline are inadequate for the purpose for which they are required, and are trying to get a better class of officer. A comparison of that kind is absolutely unmeaning and illusory. His hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Abercromby Division always reminds me of Sir Walter Scott or George Eliot, who, whenever they wanted to find a chapter heading, wrote a verse themselves and ascribed it to an "old song." Whenever my hon. and gallant friend finds it difficult to enforce an argument, he always invents an old song or a new song to illustrate it. He told the House yesterday that all officers of Continental armies were raised from the ranks.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): I said they had served in the ranks.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: As a matter of fact, in France some officers are promoted from the ranks because, very much to the regret of the authorities, they have not been able to provide sufficient officers from the military colleges. But in Germany, no officer serves in the ranks, he has to be balloted for before he is taken, and even those who do pass a year in the ranks under the circumstances I have described, are not taken for the Regular Army, but for the Landwehr. I think we must, therefore, pause and ask ourselves whether we are really supplying the fighting line with competent officers.

I will not deal with the question of the Yeomanry. My impression is that the Government will be well advised to give way on that point, and I trust they will do so. But I would like to touch on the question of the Volunteer Force, which I admit I consider a subsidiary question. In the first place, it is not the Army that is going to fight our battles. It never has done so, and I do not believe it ever will; but, be that as it may, I do not trouble myself very much on that matter, for I believe that when the Bill has passed, if it does pass, there will be no difference whatever between the Volunteers as they are now and as they will be then. With regard to what I may call the penal clauses, I do not think my hon. and gallant friend the Member for Sheffield need trouble about them. They are rather like the famous punishment in which the penalty is death or a 5s. fine, and you need not pay the fine unless you like." It is my impression that the right hon. Gentleman will relax those penalties and that the Volunteers will go on very much as they do now. They will have, it is true, the advantage of being organised and looked after by a miscellaneous body, the structure of which has not yet been defined; but I would remind the House that at the only time our Forces were in the hands of local authorities they were worse conducted and there was more corruption and failure than at any other time. That is an historical fact. I admit, however, that I do not anticipate such a state of things under modern conditions. I only hope that when the Volunteers come under the Lord-Lieutenant and the county council and the rest of the omnium gatherum proposed, they will be very much improved; but, as far as I can see, there will not be any change at all, except that they will be reduced in numbers.

It is part of the scheme, as I understand it, that the Volunteers shall, if necessary, go out as units in case of war. My hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Abercromby Division gave the House a little lecture yesterday on voluntary service, but there was no truth in it at all.

MAJOR SEELY: The point I endeavoured to make was that, in point of fact, when you have forced men to serve in your home Army, you find it difficult to get them to serve abroad.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: On that point I absolutely and entirely agree with the hon. and gallant Member, but I think he did very much dwell upon the question of whether good work would be done by men serving under compulsion. But as a matter of fact all men serve under compulsion. In this Bill compulsion is provided for. Every single one of these men who is still serving in the Force when a war takes place is compelled to serve for one year or for the duration of the war. It is quite certain that unless we have some compulsion of that kind we get no service at all. It is a dream to imagine that we can get service without compulsion in this sense. During the war in America between the North and South—a National cause if ever there was one—what happened? The men who had joined for six months went away the moment they got their liberty, and President Lincoln had to use his immense influence to put the law in correspondence with the circumstances and bring back these men or keep them where they were.

The Swiss Army has been held up as an example for our imitation and as bearing in some way on this Bill. But are we going to have the Swiss system? Nothing the least like it. If the Swiss system is good, our system is very bad. The Swiss Army is a conscript Army. The hon. and gallant Member has told the House that it is only called out for repetition courses every other year. That was so, but the Swiss Government found that that did not give a sufficient military education, and they changed it, and the men have now to come out every year.

MAJOR SEELY: No; not last year certainly.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The hon. and gallant Member is perfectly right; but the arrangement was found so unsatisfactory that the law has been altered. Let me compare the training of the Swiss Army with that of the Territorial Force. The Swiss preliminary training for infantry is sixty-five days, but the preliminary training of the men of the Territorial Force is eight to fourteen, and forty drills; for the cavalry the Swiss training is ninety days against our fourteen, and for the artillery seventy-five days against our eight to fourteen. The period of service in the Swiss Army is eight years, and the total number of days training is, for a private, 164 days, while the equivalent period in our Army is forty-eight.

For the non-commissioned officers the period of training is 164 days plus 103 days for special instruction, a total of 267 days. In the case of officers, a lieutenant has to serve for 431 days in addition to his annual trainings. The repetition courses are in the infantry eleven days annually, and in the artillery fourteen. It is a pity, I think, that my hon. and gallant friend did not draw attention to these facts when he held up the Swiss as an example for our imitation. The Secretary for War recently took the chair when a Paper was read on the Swiss Army by an officer of Volunteers. I wonder the right hon. Gentleman was not tempted to set the lecturer right. The latter admitted that he knew that the Swiss Army was not thought much of by the German War Office, and, in order to get out of that difficulty, he said the Germans have apparently only lately discovered that it was owing to their adopting the Militia system, that they succeeded in saving their country and making it what it is. There again is an example of how people are misled. What was this Prussian Militia system adopted after the battle of Jena? In one day, the audience were told, the Prussian Army was swept away by an Army on a Militia basis. What was the Army on the Militia basis? The Army of Bonaparte in 1806, I suppose the most professional Army that ever trod shoe-leather or carried a bayonet. Then it was said that they were beaten in the long run by the Prussian Militia system. The Prussian Militia system was compulsion on every man in Prussia who could bear a gun to serve for three years in the Army. If that is the idea of Militia service, we are a very long way off it in this country. But I can excuse the lecturer when I consider the point of view from which he approached the subject. He said that in Switzerland they were not cursed with the Blue Water school. Can the depth of folly and ignorance go further? What is the Blue Water School? It is the product of the study of our great sailors who have preserved this country inviolate through many generations, and who believe they have accumulated a store of military and naval knowledge which is worth placing at the disposal of their country. That a British officer should be silly enough in the presence of the Secretary for War to praise and hold up for admiration the organisation of an Army because the people of that country are not cursed with a Blue Water school is a strange departure from propriety—I will not say from sanity.

Are we really going to provide for the expansion of the Army by Volunteers? I do not think we are, or that in his heart the right hon. Gentleman thinks we are. As to the number of Volunteers on the outbreak of war, I would draw attention to what was said by the authorities questioned on this matter by the War Commission. The Inspector-General of Recruiting said—

> "The number of Volunteer companies at first required were obtained with the greatest ease. The second drafts required to replace these in the spring of 1901 were obtained with more difficulty, and, indeed, not obtained in sufficient numbers; and it was found to be impossible on a later attempt to obtain at all an adequate number. The Volunteers obtained on the last call in the autumn of 1901 only amounted to 2,413 as against 10,500 obtained on the first call."

What was the reason? There is some testimony on this point. The hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield asked why the Volunteer ceased to come, and he said the reason was that the Yeomanry were getting 5s. a day without qualification and service companies 1s. a day with a very high qualification; also that the great war fever had passed away. The Inspector-General of Recruiting also said that—

> "The Volunteer private did not see why he should go out for 1s. a day in the Volunteer service companies when he could go out for 5s. as a Yeoman."

That is a reason, but it does not quite fit in with the case which it is desired to make. It is true, moreover, that war fevers do arise and pass away. I make no charge against the Volunteers. Men do not go to war for the picnic anywhere. But the whole organisation of the Volunteers is on a basis which makes it improbable that they will give the necessary service. Let the matter be put to the test. If the Secretary of State will ask the Volunteer commanding officers to get a statement from the men serving as to how many of them are willing during the next twelve months to go to any war which may break out, he will get some idea as to what it is he is really counting upon. Why this should not be done I am at a loss to understand.

The whole organisation of the Volunteers shows that they are not intended to supply units for a war abroad; we are driven back, and shall always be driven back, on the Reserve we have prepared for the Regular Army. Lastly, I want to say a word about the artillery. We are living in a perfect fools' paradise as regards this subject. The right hon. Gentleman has been acquitted of any attempt to mislead the House in the answer he gave to a question regarding the new guns, but the answer could scarcely have been different if it had been deliberately designed to mislead. The answer was one from which any human being would have carried away the impression that the guns in question were first-class guns, equal, if not superior, to the guns of foreign Powers. If our gunners were in action against foreign troops and were armed only with this gun, they would simply be destroyed 1,500 yards before they got into action. I do not know whether the cumulative effect of what I have said has produced on others an impression like that which I am under myself. My impression is that we are playing with these problems; we are not really taking the matter seriously at all. We are not following the example of Switzerland or of any other country. We are pretending that we can achieve our objects with practically no training and under conditions which are not those which make soldiers, or under which anybody has ever succeeded in dealing with such a problem. I am not one of those who believe the right hon. Gentleman will not get his Territorial Army. I do not see why he should not get it. He has the Volunteers now, even if he is going to leave them exactly as they are. What I want to know is, has the right hon. Gentleman got an Army, or when the right hon. Gentleman has got the men, can it be reasonably supposed that he will get an Army which will uphold the honour and preserve the safety of this country in time of war? Although a great deal can be done by good will, we must have also discipline and confidence. There are Members of this House who know very well by experience what I and many others only know by reading—they know perfectly well that when a man is called upon to face death, and it becomes a question as to whether he ought to go forward, to go back or to remain where he is at the risk of his life, everything depends upon association with his officers, confidence in his comrades, and, however irksome it may be, upon discipline. Shall we create men in the Territorial Army like the men of the 10th Legion, or the Old Guard, or the men of the Light Division? Are you preparing an Army for that day of trial, to stand the tremendous pressure upon the human organism and the human spirit that was imposed by intimate contact with the sight and fear of death? Because if you are not, all these fine words and speeches are not worth anything at all. You may point to your Army and your county associations and say "Look at our success." You may have 300,000 men playing about with guns, and organised in brigades and divisions, and say that is success. But that is not the real test. The ultimate test, the only serious test of whether you have an Army at all is the test of the day of battle. I venture to hope hon. Members on this side of the House and some hon. Members on the other side of the House will ask themselves whether we are preparing to meet that test; whether it is in accordance with the universal teaching of all time that we shall postpone our preparations for war until the enemy is at our gates; whether it is in accordance with the teaching of this and all other ages that we should provide inferior troops with inferior officers, and whether it be in accordance with that teaching that we should be the one isolated example of that departure from the accepted doctrine of every other country in the world. Do we believe that we can do without effort, without sacrifice, without science, and without expense, that which other countries with all these things have found it difficult to accomplish? For all these reasons I cordially support the Amendment of my right hon. friend.

*MR. ACLAND (Yorkshire, Richmond) said the House would hardly expect him to enter into and answer the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The House had been told many things and had heard many strong expressions. They had been told that every speaker from the Government benches on Army matters was wrong, and that nothing had been done by anybody since the Government had come into office; that their Returns were worthless; that the House had been misled by the phrases used and, once or twice that no truth at all had been uttered by Members on those benches. That was such strong language that he did not dare to imitate it. There was, however, one question which struck him as important, bearing in mind what had already taken place. Surely ex-Ministers for War could not make any great claim to have left the Army in a satisfactory condition, while at the same time attacking violently and mercilessly the schemes that had been brought before the House for improving the condition of the Army as left by them. The question, for instance, which, the House had to ask itself about the training of officers by the scheme now under consideration was not whether it was an ideal scheme which would give the officers as much training as they would like them to have, but whether it was not a great improvement upon anything that was done, or intended to be done, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The right hon. Gentleman left the Army short of 4,000 officers, and surely he could not go on and denounce the effort which was now being made to get rid of that grave danger and produce a better state of things. With regard to the Reserves there was the actuarial question, and the general question. Their actuarial Return had been attacked. It would be defended and justified at the proper time. But on the general question he could reply at once. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think there was to be some change in the system of supplying Reserves for the Regular Army. He had mentioned the second battalion of the Devon regiment in order to allege that the system which produced that battalion was being done away with. There would be no such change. The special contingent was intended to supply drafts; they did not take the place of the men who filled up the Reserve, which was secured to bring up the battalions to their full strength. The filling up of the battalions would go on in exactly the same way as before. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover had attacked the proposed organisation in two portions, professional and non-professional, and complained that it was not as suited to our needs as a system of three lines of support. That suggestion had been supported in a leading article in The Times. But the argument for it entirely broke down when examined, for it was found that the second line was said to be required for two purposes—providing drafts and also serving in complete units. These two different things could not be done by the same force, and therefore, as drafts were essential, a draft providing force had to be set up separately. There would then be, according to the right hon. Gentleman, apart from this force, a second line which must be either professional or non-professional But if the second line was a professional force, when war came it would compete with the Regular Army for the same class of recruits. On the other hand, if the second and third lines were non-professional forces, they would compete with the Volunteers. It was far better to have a professional force with a complete system of drafts on one side, and a non-professional force on a uniform basis on the other, than to have successive supports under different systems and different organisations. The question was whether, in a time of national disaster, when our professional resources had been exhausted, and it was necessary to call upon the nation for help, we should have time to train and complete our force before it left this country. If organisation was provided—and he believed it could be provided in the best possible way by having a home force organised in one system—we could devote all our attention to training, and we should be in a much better position to send out a great force to bear the burden cast upon our shoulders. The right hon. Gentleman had also spoken of the practical and the problematical side of the Government scheme, and had made much of the point that if the practical side, or Field Force, succeeded, the problematical side, or Home Force, must fail. That would have been true if he had applied it to the Militia in the past, for if the Militia had succeeded in doing its duty to the Regular line, namely, by supplying them with recruits in time of peace and drafts in time of war, it was fairly certain that they would have failed to perform the other part of their task, that of expansion. Surely, however, it was one of the great benefits of this new plan that it enabled the two things to be kept distinct; it enabled the Regular line to do its work with its drafts provided for it, and did not interfere with the Home Force. He understood that it was one of the chief aims of the scheme to separate the professional from the non-professional side of our national forces, in order to ensure that the success of the one might be entirely independent of the success of the other, and in order, too, that they might complete the Regular Army and keep it up to the full strength without interfering with the Home Force at all. He might comment upon one point raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, who had very much blamed, as he understood, the Secretary for War for having confessed that there was no strategical reason at the bottom of the fixing the expeditionary force at a certain number.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said he had not blamed the Secretary for War, but the right hon. Gentleman had said that it was an accident that the number was fixed at what it was. He had said that in his opinion the number was too large, and that he agreed with the Leader of the Opposition as to that.

*Mr. ACLAND said that then perhaps he was in agreement with the right hon. Baronet in saying that there was no reason in the nature of things why this particular force should be kept at that particular number. What he meant was that, although it was considered necessary to maintain that force at present at a certain number of battalions, for certain purposes, in certain parts of the world, yet, when we had got, in the next few or many years, a power of expansion outside our professional force, and when our prospective relations with foreign countries admitted of it, then we might safely cut off some of those triplets of battalions which the right hon. Baronet mentioned. [Ironical Opposition cheers.]

*Sir CHARLES DILKE: Subject, of course, to the quality of the short-service troops at home.

*Mr. ACLAND said he ought, in answer to the jeers from the other side, to say that he was simply expressing his own opinion and his own hopes for the future, and he hoped the opinion of many of those behind him. With regard to the vexed question of the adjutants, he might say that what was intended, or what was hoped, was more perhaps an ideal of the General Staff to which the battalions might be educated than anything which it was intended to rush upon them whether they liked it or not.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Is the hon. Gentleman speaking for the Government, or giving his own opinion?

*Mr. ACLAND said in this case he believed he was speaking for the Government.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: It is just as well we should know.

*Mr. ACLAND said he thought it might be understood that that idea of the General Staff was based upon good reasons. It was based upon the main idea which had dictated so many of the improvements and modifications made since the war, on the distinction between command and training on the one side and administration on the other. There was no expectation that, in the Territorial Army, the adjutants would do the whole of the work now done by the Regular adjutants. It was rather intended that they should do the clerical work which was now done by the Regular adjutants, and that the work of training should be done from outside. It was believed that they would get better results if they had instructors from outside rather than adjutants from the inside. He was sure that many battalions would be glad to have their orderly room work done by one of their own officers, and to have the whole machinery of training external to the battalion itself, and not done by one of the officers of the battalion. Of course, all battalions were not ready for that, but he was glad to know that there were many battalions which believed that the system was perfectly practicable.

*Mr. ACLAND gave as an example the Lanark Artillery Volunteers. On the question of cost it was stated in the Memorandum that the matter of allowances was not absolutely settled. When they came to the figures they found what would be received by an ordinary trooper of the Yeomanry at present and under the new scheme. Assuming, for the sake of argument only, that 1s. a day was given for the messing allowance, then the figures were these. The trooper would get under the new scheme 10s. 8d. a day for fifteen days, while under the old scheme he would receive 10s. 9d. for eighteen days. Surely, that was not a very great difference, and surely they would not have the Yeomanry entirely destroyed owing to a small change of that sort. It would be seen by the noble Lord the Member for the City of Oxford that the sum of 10s. 8d. a day for fifteen days was very considerably in excess of the 7s. a day, which, as had been truly said, it now cost to keep man and horse. With regard to the officers of infantry, and in reference to the question asked by the noble Lord the Member for Maidstone, it might be interesting to compare the allowance which would be received by the ordinary captain of infantry of the Home Force in the future with what he received now. In future he would receive 19s. 8½d. a day as compared with 8s. at present. Surely that was a very considerable improvement, which should do a great deal to encourage men to take commissions in the Territorial Army. In the case of a captain of Yeomanry, the new figure was £1 2s. 5¼d. a day compared with the old figure of £1 3s.—a loss of only 6¾d. He hoped that they would not lose the splendid Yeomanry officers they had at present for the sake of the 6¾d. a day which they might be asked to lose. Someone had said in the course of the debate that they could not afford to be patriotic in these days, but he thought that there was still a great deal of patriotism knocking about. He found, in a small way, that people were very willing to be Volunteers if only they saw that the force was encouraged and treated seriously. A man did not make strict examination as to whether the sixpence he might spend on a railway journey to attend drill would be repaid or not. He belonged to a battalion which consisted mostly of ordinary Civil Service clerks, many of them with pay no higher than that of a good many working men, and they would go, at Easter, for instance, from London to the neighbourhood of Hastings on their bicycles for four days outing, and would receive absolutely no grant at all. It cost each man 12s. 6d. for the four days, yet all were perfectly willing to pay it for a good turn out. There were thousands of similar cases throughout the country, and there was not that absolute lack of patriotism which would compel them to pay market rates for every single hour of time which they might ask a man to give up. He might say a word or two in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, who, as a commanding officer, had a great reputation among Volunteers. Over and over again the hon. and gallant Gentleman in the course of his speech on the previous day had talked about the destruction of the Volunteers. He must know perfectly well that there was no such destruction intended at all, and he appealed to him not to talk about the destruction of Volunteers when he knew perfectly well that the word did not apply in any shape or form. The hon. and gallant Gentleman knew quite well that the conditions would be in future very much what they had been in the past. If they could make things rather more serious in connection with the Volunteers, so much the better, but there were no revolutionary conditions which could be interpreted to mean the destruction of, or even serious interference with, the Volunteers. The Bill, in many parts of it, was not new at all. Clauses had been taken which had been in Volunteer Acts before. Clauses 23 and 24, as to trial of offences and penalties, contained no new and terrible system of courts-martial for trifling offences or anything of that kind, as he rather gathered the hon. and gallant Gentleman had intended to convey on the previous day. Let them take part of Clause 24, which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had particularly mentioned. It stated—

> 'Provided that a man who has been dealt with summarily by his commanding officer shall be deemed to have been tried by a court-martial."

That was taken simply and bodily from Clause 43 of the Militia Act, and it was the legal way of conveying the fact that a man, who had been dealt with by his commanding officer, could not possibly be tried again by court-martial for the same offence, which had been washed out, and summarily dealt with. He agreed that the words were not the best that could be devised, but possibly better words could be suggested in Committee to make the point clear.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT asked, if the hon. Member contended that the clause he had read applied at the present time in any shape or form to the Volunteer force; was it not an entirely novel thing?

*MR. ACLAND said it was not a novel thing at all under the Militia Act. There was nothing in the clause which was not perfectly well known in the Auxiliary Forces at present. He thanked the House for listening to him so patiently.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said that those who had followed the debates on this new scheme must have been struck with two things: (1) how very little interest was taken in the debates on the matter; and (2) how curious it was that in the House of Commons as at present constituted they were almost entirely without any expert knowledge upon military matters. In all matters affecting trade, commerce, or education, they always found in the House some great critic whose opinion had some influence with the country; but there was not in the present House of Commons one single professional soldier whose opinion carried weight outside the House. [AN HON. MEMBER: What about you?] Although he knew more about the subject than most people he did not claim to be an expert, and there was in the House little or no expert opinion on military matters which was of any practical value. There was a certain amount of trained civilian opinion, but that was not expert opinion, and the House, when considering Army discipline and treatment, would do well to recollect that they were acting without the slightest expert guidance. When this scheme was first put forward he was considerably attracted towards it, largely by the provision of the expeditionary or striking force, and what appeared to him to be the courageous treatment of some of the weak points in our present military system. He was attracted to it because he thought he recognised in it the conception of a national Army based upon a local system; but he had since altered his opinion. How did this scheme affect that part of our Army which was kept and meant for fighting, and upon which our national and Imperial existence absolutely depended? That was a vital point. First of all, he recognised that they started under this scheme with 21,000 less effective soldiers than before. He regretted that step, because he thought it was a great mistake, and unless it could be shown that there was something to make up for that loss, on that ground alone he would be inclined to condemn the scheme. He did not find any fault with what was contemplated in the first instance, but did the scheme provide what was foreshadowed? What did the scheme put forward? In the year 1906 they had 78,000 British troops in India, and 52,000 in the Colonies, or in round numbers 130,000 British troops. The new scheme undertook to maintain in fighting efficiency that number of troops in India and the Colonies, but he would make every allowance and place the number at 100,000. But the new plan also undertook to provide an expeditionary force of 167,000 men. Placing the number at 150,000 it meant that the new scheme would have to maintain, keep up, and equip with war material 250,000 men for service outside our shores. That was not an inadequate provision, and if the scheme really provided that number he would give it his blessing instead of his ban. The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean and the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool, seemed to think that the striking force was too large, but he did not agree with that view, although he was aware it was held by his leader. But did this scheme really provide 250,000 men? In that total, and especially amongst the 150,000 for the expeditionary force, would be included the whole of the first-class Reserve, and he wished to know how they were going to maintain that force at full strength after it had left these shores. It was proposed to keep up this force partly with the 130,000 men who might be called non-combatants, or semi-trained men, who would have to be kept under strict discipline, or else they would have all the trouble which resulted from employing semi-trained men. If those 250,000 were actually facing the enemy what would be the annual wastage? They would be sure to require at least 25 per cent. to keep the force up to strength, and that would mean another 62,000 men annually. How did the right hon. Gentleman's scheme provide for that total? He did not think they would be able to provide 20,000 from the sources which the Regular Army had at its disposal. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to conceive the position the officers would be put in. They selected some of the best men possible for the purpose of training, and then when they could be useful for the only purpose for which soldiers existed they said, "No, we retain you at that work." It could not work, and no officer worthy of the name would remain in the service if he was not to be free to go to the front with his own regiment. He had a suggestion to make to the right hon. Gentleman for what it was worth. He could conceive that these Regular Army officers might be replaced by other officers recently in the Regular Army, whose term of service was over and who might be expected to carry on the work effectively. That was one of the points which was not in the scheme.

*Mr. HALDANE said that if war broke out, those officers might eventually be replaced by what were called Reserve officers—officers who had been in the Army and were now in the Reserve—and the four captains who belonged to the training battalion would, as had been explained, probably go to the front in command of drafts or in some other capacity.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY said it was satisfactory to be able to extract explanations from the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. HALDANE: I said so before.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY said it was probably his fault that he did not know, but the right hon. Gentleman would allow that in a large scheme of this sort it might sometimes be necessary for him to repeat his explanations. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had answered his point. At all events, the officers thus employed would be permitted to go with their regiments to the front, and their places would be taken by others. So far so good. But would these training battalions be able to provide men fit to take their place in the fighting line? They had got to deal, so far as he could make out, very largely with the type of soldier who used to go into the Militia regiments. The question was whether they would be able to evolve out of comparatively bad stuff a soldier able to take his place in the fighting line. He was doubtful on that point. If these training battalions were not able to provide enough men, on his own showing the right hon. Gentleman would fall back largely on what might be provided by the new Territorial Army. That was the other source to which he looked for the maintenance of the fighting force in the field. In order to create that fighting force the right hon. Gentleman said, quite frankly, that he gave up the present system of Auxiliary Forces. The right hon. Gentleman had with reason much to say in favour of the better theory which the new scheme introduced. But they had to recollect that in practice the system he distrusted had at all events given us, though with some difficulty, a certain amount of good fighting stuff which had enabled us to win, even though victory had not been achieved so quickly as we should have liked. The right hon. Gentleman had to satisfy the House that under this scheme he would get men and officers from the Territorial Force to which he looked for the reinforcement of the Line. He had also to satisfy them that the scheme would result in such a reduction of expenditure as would make it worth while for the country to accept it as an economical and efficient system. He thought the speech of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was based upon an error. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to lay down that one of the duties of the Territorial Army was to find men for the expansion of the Army in the field. He definitely said that by expansion he meant the addition of units to the fighting line. That was not, and it ought not to be, the function of the Territorial Army. The function of the Territorial Army was not to find units. Generals who had served in the field would state that when they asked that the strength should be maintained they wished to get it from units which they already had, and not from units with a different training and character. He believed the duty of the Territorial Army would be to find not so much units as drafts. If they asked it to find units they would be asking it to do what it could not accomplish. He had not seen in this scheme—although he could conceive that it might be brought into it—that this Territorial Force should be affiliated more closely with the Regular regiments. If the Territorial Force was to provide additional strength to the fighting line, it should be remembered that not a single man need go into the fighting line unless he chose to do so. The members of the force were not asked under the scheme to make a declaration a long time beforehand. It might happen that at the time when stress occurred they would have to ask the question whether they would or would not go, and it might be that they would not get the response which they wished. He did not think it would be a satisfactory position for the country to be in if they were dependent on the Territorial Force to make an efficient fighting line in the moment of emergency and difficulty. Surely if the scheme was to go through it would be better to have an arrangement that a certain percentage of the force should be under obligation to serve—say 200,000 out of 300,000—and upon whom they could rely at a pinch to go abroad. The right hon. Gentleman asked the Yeomanry and the Volunteers to give up a great deal of time, a large amount of pay, and also something of the peculiar position which they were proud to hold in the Auxiliary Forces. He was not quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman and his advisers recognised the extraordinary differences in the views taken of this question by the Yeomanry regiments. A few days ago he was consulting with the representatives of two distinct types of Yeomanry. One of them told him that the men of his regiment, so long as they were thoroughly well found and made comfortable in camp, did not expect or wish to take away any money in their pockets except £5 per horse. His other friend said that was exactly what his men would not do, and that unless each man was able to put into his pocket 4s. per day, however well he might mess him, he would not get one of the men to come out. It was a question whether the right hon. Gentleman would find the response which he so fondly anticipated. The Volunteers were not asked to make so much difference in their status, but still they were asked to sacrifice a great deal. He wondered how the theory of absolutely equal treatment was going to be carried out. Could they ask the members of the force to accept exactly the same arrangements in time of peace as to food, dress, and other matters? He doubted it, and yet the whole scheme depended for its practical result upon determinedly sticking to equality of treatment throughout; otherwise the democratic and homogeneous Army broke down before it had been created. The men in the Territorial Force, representing what the Volunteers now represented, would be men earning a considerable amount of wages, and they would be earning exceptionally large wages at the time of a threat of war or of actual war. They would belong to certain industries working at full time or extra time, and they would have not only large wages but the chance of promotion. Surely it was essential that none of these men should suffer by the fact that they gave their services to the country. Surely they ought to arrange that the men should get full compensation for the wages or the promotion they lost. The men should be trained before war was imminent. To postpone the training until war had broken out would be a mistake. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was not practical, and he would be open to the charge of setting up a bogus force on which the country could not rely in time of danger. He knew that there was a school of thought which believed that comparatively little drill and a spirit of patriotism could make a good soldier; but old-fashioned soldiers like himself did not agree with that.

Mr. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): What about the Boers?

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY said he did not want to go into all the arguments about the Boer War; but he maintained that if we had had a more disciplined Army there would not have been so many disgraceful surrenders as there were in that war. If the present scheme was to stand good these men were only to be drilled after war had been declared. But who was to drill them? The right hon. Gentleman said that he would depend on Reserve officers for drilling the third battalion recruits; but that did not appear in the Bill. Nor did he see any arrangement in the measure for making musketry training effective. Again they could not rely on having efficiency of training for those recruits unless there were professional adjutants attached to each territorial regiment. It must be borne in mind that those adjutants were changed every four years and came fresh from the Regular Army with all the knowledge they had learned there. He admitted that many Volunteer officers were competent to drill their men and to command them on parade; but they were not equally competent as Regular officers to enforce discipline. They had already been told that the provision of officers was inadequate. He believed that that was so. He would not say that some officers should not be promoted from the ranks; but he doubted the wisdom of making that system universal. He thought it was the late Lord Palmerston who said that he had the greatest reliance on well trained troops under well-bred officers. Was the right hon. Gentleman sure that he would get good, real work out of the county associations? He was frightened about these county associations. Already as much work as they possibly could do was put on county gentlemen; and he confessed he saw difficulties in the composition of the county associations and the duties to be assigned to them. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that they were to be the recruiters for the Territorial Force and to be the contractors for the supplies of that force? If so, there would be great pressure put on them to give the contracts into the hands of local tradesmen. He would not let the county associations interfere with the raising of the soldiers of the Territorial Army or with their treatment as soldiers; but when they were soldiers no longer the county associations might look after them and their wives and families. The right hon. Gentleman had received a considerable amount of support in the country for his scheme from the idea that it would lead to economy. That idea had been considerably exploded in the course of the debate; but if it was to be an economical scheme it would be a rank and hopeless failure. His contention was that it would lead to largely increased expense. It was said by some people that a cheap and effective Army could be based on an appeal to the manhood of the country for national service. That was a cheap, tawdry, and paltry pleasure to indulge in when speaking from platform in the country and arguing that the cost of the Army should be reduced. That was where democratic speakers always seemed to him to break down so hopelessly. He had tried to see what merits there were in the scheme. He admitted that there was a theoretic symmetry about it; but it was not practical. He thought that it was an imposition, and that the chief victim of that imposition was the right hon. Gentleman himself. Like many people who fell in love, the right hon. Gentleman saw nothing but perfection in it. He would have to acknowledge, however, that in many cases, he had not provided for efficiency and also that he could not get the fighting efficiency he desired at the cost he proposed. The right hon. Gentleman was, in fact, conducting an Army on Christian Science principles as expounded by Mrs. Eddy; but that would not do; and it was rather unfair to put his scheme before the country as a solution of the great problem of Army reform. Like many other old soldiers he was sick to death at all the squabbling over the Army, and he could wish that it should be taken out of the hands of the country and even of the House of Commons and put into the hands of the best military experts. Apparently, however, that could not be; and year after year they were face to face with some wretched squabble about getting economy with efficiency. That they could not get. Therefore, it was with considerable reluctance that he would have to give his support to the Amendment moved by the right hon. Member for Dover.

*MAJOR DUNNE (Walsall) said he rose to support the Second Reading of the measure now before the House. He thought that one of the most important underlying features of the Bill was that the right hon. Gentleman would by this scheme bring the different elements of the people of the country into a deeper sympathy with our military organisation. He did not think that it was understood how little sympathy there was with the military forces in this country. It was only when outbreaks of war took place that the country seemed to find out that we had an Army. Whoever, for instance, in times of peace heard of a public man making a speech from a public platform about the Army? Abroad, a state of affairs such as he had described was impossible, because in all European countries there was hardly a single family which had not a member either now serving in the military forces or who had served. Consequently the interests of the whole population were directly affected by anything which affected the efficiency or well-being of the Army. It was not so very long ago that soldiers in uniform were refused admission to certain portions of places where public entertainments were held, and if the population of the country were in sympathy with the military forces such a thing could not take place. The right hon. Gentleman, hoped, however, to bring the Army and the population into greater sympathy with each other, not by conscription, but by means of the county associations. He hoped that very great interest indeed would be aroused by carrying the principle of local self-government into the affairs of the Territorial Army, so that the Army and its efficiency would be brought more nearly home to the different sections of the population throughout the country. If that were done, a vast set forward would be given to an increase in numbers and to the general efficiency of the Territorial Army. If the scheme was to be a success, however, they must get in all those who might be interested in the subject; not only the Lord-Lieutenant and the landlord, but the farmer and the employer of labour, so that all classes of society should unite. Until they could get them to unite, he did not think the scheme would be a success. He would point out one way in which the efficiency of the Territorial Army would be increased by the appointment of these county associations. He happened to have been a staff officer of a Volunteer brigade, and he knew the difficulty that corps had in obtaining sufficient ground to manœuvre over, and therefore derive benefit from the fortnight's or week's Volunteer training which took place in each year. If, however, they could enlist the sympathies of all the landowners and farmers and of the other people whose land was wanted to practise upon, he thought a great step would then have been taken to increase the efficiency and the value of the Volunteer training, whether it was eight days or a fortnight, or whatever it might be, short or long. Therefore he thought that not only would they gain in efficiency by setting up these associations, but they would bring the civil population into closer sympathy with the needs and requirements of the Territorial Army. On the 28th February last, the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil said, that—

> "His personal feeling was one of strong suspicion that by this scheme they would strengthen the military spirit and thereby increase the risk of war."

He thought it was an established fact now that the risk of war was certainly not increased by universal service. He was not advocating for one moment the question of universal service, but by bringing home the responsibility to each man of knowing what fighting meant he certainly thought they did not run the risk of anything in the shape of an aggressive policy, and that if many of those who shouted themselves hoarse on Mafeking night had known that there was any probability of their being called upon to make their words good, the country would have evinced a more sober spirit on that occasion. It was an established fact that in all countries where conscription and universal service were enforced it had a distinctly sobering effect upon the warlike spirit of the country. The only exception that he could think of would be that of an entirely autocratic empire where they had a standing army at the call of a despot. That might, of course, lead to an aggressive policy, but in countries under freer institutions that would not be so. "Defence not defiance," was the present motto of the Volunteer Force, and he was sure that that motto would be quite applicable to the new Territorial Army which it was proposed to set up under this scheme. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil also said on the same occasion in regard to a proposal to look after Reservists and discharged soldiers, which was one of the functions put upon these county associations, that—

> "He protested against the present tendency to give preferential treatment in the matter of employment to men who had served in the Army."

He maintained that nothing that they could do for men who had been in the Army and who were either Reservists or discharged soldiers could be looked upon as preferential. These men had volunteered to give seven years of their lives at that period of all others when it was most important for them to start a career, and the work of the various associations now existing was to make up to them the long start that the rest of their fellow workmen had obtained in setting themselves up in life and in qualifying themselves for the various professions and employments in which they engaged. Our soldiers had lost seven years in the race of life, and all they asked was that these associations should make up to them the loss of those valuable seven years. The term "preferential employment" was not, he thought, a correct term to apply to the small aid which was and would be afforded to our discharged soldiers and Reservists. He would like in conclusion to say one word upon what he thought might possibly be the effect of this Bill on the numbers of the Territorial Army. He thought the immediate effect would probably be that the present number of the Auxiliary Forces would be reduced on account of the six months training when embodiment occurred. On the calling out of the Regular Army when war broke out certain trades were extremely active, especially those engaged on Government contracts. In the case of large engineering firms like Armstrong's, which had a battalion of Volunteers formed of their employees, it stood to reason that the majority of those men would be among the most active and keenest workers in the firm, and the effect of this proposal would be that the employers would be rather inclined to discourage their men from joining Volunteer battalions connected with their own works. In order to meet that difficulty there would have to be great elasticity and great differentiation between the calling out of the different forces, both as regarded locality, the units, and also the men. He thought, moreover, that men employed on the active service of keeping troops supplied with the necessities of war were serving their country equally satisfactorily with the man who went and did six months training and shoudered a rifle when called upon. Therefore, no stigma of not having fulfilled his patriotic duty should be cast upon one who did not leave his business, in order to enable the Government to furnish the materials of war.

*Mr. J. WARD, referring to the remark of the right hon. Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire that there were no great military experts in the House, and that it would be much better if the military experts were given an opportunity of entirely deciding technical questions of this kind, supposed the right hon. Gentleman would agree that one could easily get military experts of equal standing who would give equally important declarations in favour of the scheme and against it. It was not a question for military experts, it was a question whether the attempted reorganisation appeared from a common sense point of view to be better than the system of organisation which prevailed at the present time. He did not suppose that whatever was said by Labour Members would prevent the Bill becoming law, and he warned hon. Members with whom he was closely associated not to deprive themselves, by open hostility at the commencement of the debate, of the right to attempt to mould the Bill in a democratic direction. There might be many things said in favour of the proposals even from their point of view. He was an advocate of peace and did not believe in war as a means of settling international disputes. He wanted to see a reduction in the cost of our standing Army, and he saw nothing in the Bill to prevent him pressing the War Minister in that direction. Reference had been made to the suggested increase of the striking force. He thought the Bill had nothing to do with the striking force at all, and therefore the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean on the previous day, when he had attempted to enlist the hostility of the Labour Members against the Bill on the ground that it was to increase the standing Army, had not much force. He had read the Bill carefully and he saw no such suggestion in its clauses. There might be that idea at the back of the minds of the gentlemen who advocated it, but the House of Commons would be able to defeat their proposals when they were brought forward absolutely independently of the scheme contained in the Bill. This was a Bill to codify and unify the organisation of the voluntary forces for home defence, and he thought the Bill and its proposals would be just as necessary with a striking force of 67,000 as with a striking force of 167,000. The first thing they had to do before they proceeded to reduce the standing Army or the striking force was to perfect and unify as far as they could the Auxiliary Forces on which they had to rely for home defence. Therefore, the scheme, instead of preventing a reduction of the cost of the standing Army, would, in his opinion, greatly assist economists in the future in attempting legitimately and properly to effect such reduction. He was not alone in that view. The criticisms of the late War Secretary indicated that he held a similar view, and as the right hon. Gentleman was a military expert of renown he (Mr. Ward) was in good company. It must not be taken that all supporters of the Bill favoured a large increase. He thought it would be quite possible to support the Bill and still to ask for a reduction of the standing Army. He was compelled, however, to make one or two important criticisms which were of such a character that he would have to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill if some alteration were not made in it. The fostering of the military spirit among the boys of our schools vitiated the whole principle of the Bill. They ought surely to be able to rely on grown men to defend the country in time of war, and in time to come he thought they would find plenty of men for that purpose. With all due deference to the ex-Minister for War, he also thought they would have sufficient courage to meet the enemy in the field. The history of the world showed that the great military nations had been composed of either large agricultural or large rural populations. But though town life did, no doubt, enervate the youth of the country, he had no hesitation in saying that we were as good fighters to-day as at any time of our history and that we were not quite the cowards the right hon. Gentleman would seem to suggest. The suggestion that it took years of training and discipline before a Britisher could be got to face the guns in the field of battle was, he thought, not quite true. The fostering of cadet corps in our colleges was not necessary to the Bill in any shape or form. Had the Minister for War devoted his attention to destroying the triple organisation of the Volunteers, the Yeomanry, and the Militia, and unified those forces without attempting to interfere with the school life of the children he would have effected his purpose to a greater extent than he would do by the proposals under discussion. The introduction of this into colleges and public schools and the attempt to establish such institutions as the source from which all our officers should be derived was an attempt to fashion a national Army on a social class basis, and the two principles appeared to him to be antagonistic. It was proposed to draw officers from the great colleges and educational centres which were the special preserve of the rich and well-to-do. They could never make a national Army by excluding the poor merely because they were poor from the higher positions in the new military organisation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Newport Division of Shropshire had said quoting a speech of Lord Palmerston to prove his contention, that it was absolutely necessary to have well-bred officers. That he did not dispute. The only question was what was meant by the term "well-bred." He asserted that there were soldiers in the ranks who might not have all the cultured and polished drawing-room manners that some of our officers possessed, but who, from a military point of view, were equal to any officer in the British Army. Under these circumstances he did not think the quotation was either apt or one which solved the problem. As every one knew, an Act of Geo. III. abolished the sale of offices in every department but the Army. Up to 1871 all the higher offices in the Army were bought, sold, and retained as private vested interests, therefore it was a question of money, not of breeding, up to that time. There was an unfortunate tendency in the present day, especially in Government Departments, to separate into distinct classes the supervisors and the supervised. He was very much afraid that this snobbishness, especially in the great services of the State, the Army and the Navy, this attempt to prove that it was utterly impossible to maintain discipline unless officers were drawn from one class of society and the common soldier from another, this separation of interests, this dividing into castes the Services which ought to be welded together as a whole, was probably the cause of many of our serious disasters in recent campaigns. Now that they were making an attempt to reorganise the forces, it was the business at least of Labour men who represented working men on whom the country had to rely for their fighters—he supposed no one would contest that—to put forth their views on the subject. If members of the working classes were prepared to join the ranks and to risk their lives for the defence of the Empire, they were entitled to a share of the highest offices, provided they had the necessary ability to attain to them. He did not say for one moment that a man should be appointed who was incompetent or without the necessary ability. That was not the suggestion of those who represented the interests of labour. He understood perfectly well that a very strict examination would be necessary; that men would have to qualify themselves for the positions; but once they were qualified, mere social rank should be no bar to their appointment. Unfortunately, at present, the tendency was in the opposite direction. A Return was published in 1885, and it had been brought up to 1899, showing that the number of second lieutenants appointed from the ranks in fourteen years was 343, quartermasters 597, and riding masters 56, total 996 in fourteen years, or 4 per cent. A Return which had recently been issued giving the figures for 1899 to 1902, showed that the percentage had fallen to 2 per cent.; so that it was now twice as difficult for a ranker to rise to commissioned position as it was only a few years ago. ["No."] The hon. and gallant Member opposite said it was not so, but the figures spoke for themselves. Complaint had been made that recruits would not join in sufficient numbers, and that recruits when they were secured were not of the right quality and standard. He believed there was a great deal in that, and he was afraid it would always be so as long as there was no opportunity for the ranker to rise. It might be said that at present he had the opportunity, but he was afraid that the Returns which he had quoted showed that very few got the chance. It was useless on this question merely to express sympathy or a pious opinion. There must be some definite percentage of promotions open to those from the ranks. He was certain that the Secretary for War would be in a position to attract an entirely different class of men if recruiting officers were able to say that there was a definite percentage of higher appointments open to the humblest soldiers of the Army. In France that principle was adopted, but the percentage there was much higher than he would venture to suggest for this country. He thought it would be almost impossible to attract the best men to the Army unless something of the kind he had suggested was done. At the present time he was afraid that they held out no inducements whatever to the best men to join the Army. The pay was very small, the conditions were extremely irksome, and the opportunities offered to a man were practically nil. The consequence was that the Army had been treated as a sort of human dust bin so far as concerned the lower ranks, which were largely composed of men who had probably failed in many other walks of life. He thought that by setting aside a certain percentage of commissions for the ranks, they would be able to attract some of the best of our youth, among both the working and other classes. At any rate, some attempt should be made to democratise the Territorial Force in the way he suggested, because the people would then be drawn into closer sympathy with at least the Home branch of the forces, than they had hitherto been. He would vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, but he hoped that in Committee something would be done in the direction he had indicated. With regard to the pay of the men, it was suggested, he believed, that they should receive a very small sum for their services. The argument had been used that the Regular soldiers objected to fight by the side of the Volunteer or Yeoman, who was receiving perhaps five times the pay. But the soldier who joined the Regular Army made that his profession for a certain number of years, and his position was entirely different from that of the man who left his work for a few months of the year merely to perform his regimental duties in the new Territorial Army. The man might lose his employment; he might find it difficult to return to settled employment when he came back from his training, whether that had been long or short. In these circumstances the two cases were not at all comparable, and some special rate would unquestionably have to be paid to the men of the Territorial Army—a rate far above what they would pay to the men who made soldiering a profession. He thought that the scale of expenditure contemplated under this scheme would have to be very largely extended. There was one other matter he would like to mention. He had known instances where employers had laid it down as a condition that they would not engage Volunteers. He had seen advertisements to that effect. He felt certain that unless the Secretary of State took that fact into consideration, he would fail to secure the number of men that he suggested were required in his Memorandum. The Bill might possibly be amended so as to constitute it intimidation to inquire whether a man was a Volunteer, and to treat as a criminal offence the making it a condition of employment that a man should not belong to the Territorial Army; at any rate, something must be done if they were going to get recruits and properly protect the men who joined. With regard to the proposal to place Volunteers and the Home forces under martial law, he would observe that the term court-martial had a very nasty sound about it. Among the common soldiers there was sometimes a feeling that justice was not always done by the superior officer; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised if he considered the policy which had been adopted in France, namely, that courts-martial should not be applied in time of peace even to the Regular forces. Courts-martial would never be submitted to by the Volunteer force of this country. Whilst soldiers and Britishers generally would be prepared to undergo the difficulties of a campaign and submit to the most stringent regulations when engaged in war, he felt certain that the class of the population from which the right hon. Gentleman expected to draw his recruits would be opposed to being placed under any such conditions as were suggested in the Bill. Under these circumstances it would have to be amended in that direction before it could be acceptable to the Labour Leaders of the House. He hoped the Bill would become law. He could quite see, as anyone could see, that it was absolutely necessary to destroy the triple organisation of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, the organisation must be unified. The talk of invasion was to him very peculiar. It was said that we should not be able to get the men in case of invasion, if there were no Territorial Army. If an official paragraph that a hostile army would be landed on our shores were published to-night, a million bayonets would gleam in the sun to-morrow morning and the Secretary of State for War would probably be hung up on the nearest lamp-post if he could not supply them. The military instinct of the nation was as good as ever it was. The Labour Members objected to the suggestion that there should be an enormous striking force, but they accepted the Bill because they knew, as the late Secretary of State for War had declared that afternoon, that this enormous striking force was imaginary and that the real object was to unify and codify the organisation for home defence.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said he had noticed small points of difference in the objections raised to this scheme in almost every speech that had been delivered. In his opinion the alterations with regard to the Volunteers were practically nil, and that view applied to courts-martial. In the discussion several notable cases of disagreement had occurred. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newport disagreed at almost every point with the Bill, but the one point upon which he did agree was that they should do away with the Militia. Other Members of the Opposition had expressed exactly the opposite view. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon had attacked his hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Abercromby Division for the description he had given of the Swiss Army, which he stated was absolutely out of date. He might say that his hon. and gallant friend's description was quite accurate; as to drill and other matters he had de cribed them exactly as they were last year. Evidently what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon had in his mind was a description of the Swiss Army as it would be years hence when the regulations now being made had come into force. The regulations under this scheme instead of making training more frequent would extend it over fewer years, and that was practically not a material alteration. Nearly half the speakers who had taken part in the debate in opposition to the Bill had mentioned six months training as soon as the Reserves were called out. Where they had got that idea from he did not know, because it was not in the Bill. The only thing provided was that they should be liable to be embodied. The Secretary of State for War had stated that probably six months would be the period required to make them into good soldiers, but in saying that he was merely quoting the opinion of experts; there was nothing in the Bill about six months. The great object of the Bill was that they should be able to get hold of the men when they wanted them. Great objection had been taken to the total of 160,000 men which appeared in the Memorandum. He did not think for a moment that a striking force of 160,000 men was meant. They did not want a striking force of that size to be sent off during the first month of a war; 50,000 troops would be quite sufficient for that purpose. Under this scheme he believed they would have a larger striking force than they had at the beginning of the South African War, and he believed they would have a large number of reinforcements. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover had said that the scheme would leave them too much in the hands of the officials, and that the House would lose its power. Surely the House of Commons would be able to stop the supplies when the War Office asked for too much, and that was really what had happened during the last few years. The country would always have that control. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newport had said that the Volunteers were going to be useless, and he had spoken at great length to show how unsuitable they were as soldiers. It was because they were not so useful as they might be that it was proposed in this Bill to alter their status and their position. He thought the great principle of the Bill had been generally accepted, namely, that there should be two lines, the first consisting of a striking force available at once. The second line was one which would take time before it was available for service, and would consist of a national Army popular amongst the people, and supported by them in the various districts.

That principle was so much appreciated that he believed the Bill would pass without very great modifications. He did not think the term Territorial Army was a very wise one. He hoped it would be possible to train larger numbers of men together at their training depots in order that the officers might take battalion drill and occasionally brigade drill. The more men they were able to get together the better would be the training of both men and officers. He trusted that the depots would be made larger and that the number of men trained at one time would be increased. The most important thing in the whole scheme was its finance. Ministerialists believed that the strength of the country lay to a great extent in its financial position in the world, and, whatever might be said as to preparedness for war, if the national financial position was sufficiently weakened, large armies would never help us. Therefore they thought that the question of economy was a much more important factor in Imperial matters than hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House seemed to think. He did not quite accept the figures of the Secretary of State. So far as he could see, he believed, like a good many critics, that it would cost a good deal more than was suggested. At the same time he thought even from the economical point of view it was worth while spending a million or so extra in the way proposed. The difficulty in reducing the most expensive part of the war organisation—the Regular Army—was that we had absolutely nothing the soldier would trust to fall back upon. The professional soldier never believed in anyone but the Regular soldier. Nothing else was to be depended on. The general opinion of experts was that the only soldier who would face fire was the man who had had long training But these experts ignored such recent experience as was presented in the war carried on by the Boers and by the success of the Japanese in the late war, who certainly in the later battles fought with men who had not had more than two or three months' training. Sufficient training could be given in a few months to the proposed Territorial Army to constitute a reliable force, and he believed that in time of emergency that reliable force would volunteer by units for garrison duty, and so relieve the Regular soldiers to go to the front. He believed that once we had a good Territorial Army it would be very much cheaper to provide the foreign Army, which was our great difficulty now. Experts would always tell the country that the Reserve Forces were unreliable, but if this scheme were carried out we should have something that could be relied upon by the country and those high in authority at the War Office, and he thought that in future there might be further reductions in the expenditure on the Army. The adoption of the scheme would mean that economy could be realised which under the existing system could not be effected, when there was ever-increasing military expenditure, but no increase of efficiency.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) said he approached the consideration of the subject as an ordinary country squire, and in no way as a military expert. From that point of view, he was interested in the proposal for the establishment of county associations, a proposal which, personally, he thought had much to recommend it. In many counties, and certainly in the county with which he was connected, local feeling was very strong, and it was quite possible that under local administration the best use would be made of the raw material at command. There were certain matters in connection with the establishment of county associations with respect to which he should like more information from the right hon. Gentleman. In the course of the debate it had been frequently pointed out that the tendency undoubtedly was for local work to get heavier and heavier. He thought that the chief end which the right hon. Gentleman had to aim at was to make the work of the county associations as practical as possible, to keep it in the hands of county men without the introduction of other elements. These were matters which might be gone into more fully on the Committee stage of the Bill. Though local work was increasing, there would be no lack of men to undertake the duty, providing the work was responsible and attractive, and confined to county men. There was some apprehension that associations might be governed by outside military men. There was also a fear that membership of an association might entail pecuniary responsibility. The fear he believed was unfounded.

*MR. HALDANE assented.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH said that there had, at any rate, been that feeling, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would make it abundantly clear that there was no pecuniary liability placed upon gentlemen who composed these organisations. A Memorandum had been issued by the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the scheme, and he confessed he had some little difficulty in understanding the financial proposals contained therein. It provided an approximate estimate of the cost of the Territorial Force. He understood there was nothing in that estimate for the expenditure which would be incurred by the county associations themselves for officials' salaries, rent of offices, and general administrative charges. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman in the course of his reply would give the House some more information as to the cost of the administration of the county associations.

*MR. HALDANE pointed out that there was a statement at the top of page 4 of the Memorandum on that subject.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH said it was difficult to arrive at any result from that statement. Roughly speaking, he imagined that it would take about £800 per battalion. He feared that the organisation was bound to be extremely costly, and that we should not get full value for our money. What was more, the greater the success which attended the scheme, and the greater the number of county associations that were formed, the larger would be the demands upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He wished that the House and the country should have, if possible, some estimate of the probable cost of the new scheme when it came into full operation. It was very difficult to form any opinion on that point with the materials they had now before them. He had approached the question of the county associations as a country squire; he wished to approach the consideration of Clause 3 through the eyes of the Public Accounts Committee. He had difficulty in understanding what the right hon. Gentleman's proposals were in regard to finance. So far as he could understand it the proposal was that the Army Council was to make a grant-in-aid or a block-grant to the county associations, which was to be at their absolute disposal. The principle of grants-in-aid or block-grants had in the past been open to great apprehension, and the practice was one which they ought not to encourage. At present the Volunteers got a block-grant for the expenses of their corps, but they were not in the same position as the new county associations would be, the latter having a considerable number of duties to discharge which the Volunteers had not to do formerly. It was admitted on all sides that the financial control which this House should exercise over all public expenditure was considerably lessened when the money was voted in block-grants; and he thought that the Secretary of State for War should let hon. Members see before the Bill went into Committee the form in which the new Estimate was to be laid before the House of Commons. That Estimate might amount to £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, and they should not be asked to vote such a large sum of money without being told how that money was going to be spent. He expressed strong disapproval of the drafting of Clause 3 as it stood. It seemed to him that the greatest latitude was allowed to the county associations in regard to the spending of the money, and that the control of the House of Commons was reduced to a minimum. He hoped that the sole power of dealing with the question of finance would not be left in the hands of the Army Council. Again, it was a matter of very considerable doubt whether the House of Commons should agree to a proposal by which they would be required to vote a larger and an increasing sum of money to the county associations without having the accounts audited by their own officials. So far as he could make out there was no provision made for audit by the Comptroller and Auditor General. The county associations were to audit the accounts themselves, and the House of Commons would have no opportunity of exercising that control which they ought to have.

*MR. HALDANE said that this matter had been considered very closely, and it was found that if they did not apply the system of audit proposed by the clause the correspondence of the War Office with the county associations would be interminable.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH said he would wait to hear the fuller explanation of the right hon. Gentleman when he came to reply on the whole debate; in the meantime he would respectfully say that the House of Commons ought to be most careful before consenting to any proposal which might be considered to weaken their control over expenditure. He was afraid that the right hon. Gentleman's military colleagues had achieved a considerable victory over him in that regard at the expense of the House of Commons in general and of the Public Accounts Committee in particular.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.) said he could assure the hon. Member that the Comptroller and Auditor General would have the same control over the new grants as he had at present over the Capitation Grant.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH admitted that the present arrangement was far from perfect, but it should not be weakened. He was not a military expert, but, so far as he understood the scheme, he thought that the right hon, Gentleman had made reductions in the Regular Army before he knew what was going to be put in their place.

*MAJOR McMICKING (Kirkcudbrightshire) said he found himself in rather an embarrassing position, because although he was in favour of the principle of the Bill and would give it his support on Second Reading he felt great apprehension with regard to the proposal to create 140 mobile Volunteer batteries of artillery, especially when fourteen of these batteries would be horse artillery batteries. In regard to the artillery, there were two very interesting speeches delivered in the House during the debate the previous day. He was in complete agreement with what fell from the hon. Member for Fareham in reference to the artillery. As to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool he would like to say a few words. He would take the following quotation from his speech, as reported in The Times—

> "If people who did not want to fight could be eliminated from the Army by the principle of voluntary service, and the requisite number of men could still be got, it followed that the Army would be more formidable than under a system of compulsion."

That was not a very convincing argument. He believed it to be true with regard to the rank and file, but it was misleading as regards officers especially for the artillery. When the hon. and gallant Member compared the Swiss artillery system with the proposed Territorial Army artillery he could see no analogy between the two. He would like to give to the House some figures with regard to the Swiss system. All artillery officers in the Swiss Army must have served in the ranks. At nineteen years of age every man in the country was examined medically and all who were fit must serve for twelve years in the Elite, for thirteen years in the Landwehr, and for five years in the Landsturm, making thirty years in all. Thus in the Swiss Army, where they had all these men, those of energy and talent strove to become officers in the force, and there was great emulation. Before a man became an officer he had to pass a recruit's course of fifty-five days; repetition course, eighteen days; non-commissioned officer's course, thirty-five days; recruit's course as non-commissioned officer, sixty-three days; and officer's preparatory courses, 105 days, making 276 days in all or nine months before he became an artillery officer. That was quite a different state of things from that which would exist in the Territorial Army. Before non-commissioned officers in the Swiss Army were selected for the officer's preparatory course they had to undergo an examination in general knowledge. Captains and majors had to attend special courses for officers of their rank to qualify for promotion. Promotion did not go by seniority only, and the pick of each rank only was promoted. The hon. and gallant Gentleman in a previous debate drew an analogy from or rather based his arguments on the experience of the South African War. No doubt a great many useful lessons could be learnt from that war, but so far as artillery was concerned that war had taught us very little. If the Boers had used their guns in batteries, and if their shrapnel fire had been effective, half our artillery would have been wiped out. Our batteries as a rule had to come into action in the open against the Boer artillery in prepared positions. He would like to ask a question in regard to the special contingent batteries. He believed there were thirty-three batteries for training special contingent officers and men. They would be armed with 198 eighteen-pounder guns. Their functions would be that of training men so that drafts could be sent out for the Army over sea. Let them take a hypothetical case of our field force being engaged over sea, and suppose that at a critical time another European Power joined the enemy against whom we were engaged and a danger of raid and invasion became imminent. He would like to know what would happen to those 198 guns. Would they continue to be used for training drafts for the field force over sea or would they be used to repel raid or invasion? He did not think any War Minister could come down to the House and say, if there was any danger of raid or invasion, he proposed to send the forces of the Territorial Army into action armed with fifteen-pounders while there were these eighteen-pounders in the country.

*MR. HALDANE said there were not only the guns of the batteries but there were also the reserve guns, but it was impossible to forecast beforehand what would be done.

*MAJOR McMICKING suggested that the batteries armed with these eighteen-pounder guns should be put on a four-gun basis and should be available in time of need. Anyone who had had the slightest acquaintance of the Army from within must be aware of the magnitude and complexity of the problem with which the Secretary for War was confronted. The right hon. Gentleman and his expert advisers had been hard at work for over a year obtaining a solution to the problem, and they had been assisted by various Committees appointed to investigate subsidiary questions underlying the main problem. As a result they had the Bill now before them. The scheme for its success entirely depended on the patriotic feelings of our fellow citizens. That was a high ideal, especially when it was remembered that the conditions of service in the proposed Territorial Army would be more onerous than the conditions of service in the Volunteer force to-day. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had not been afraid of a high ideal and that he had faith in the patriotism of his fellow countrymen, and he saw no reason why the 300,000 men should not be forthcoming. It was argued that it would be impossible to obtain the men, but the scheme would be a test of the free and compulsory education which the nation had been getting for the last thirty-six years. If that education had been on sound lines, if it had truly developed character, he was inclined to think that there would be no difficulty in obtaining men willing to serve. No doubt many men now serving in the Volunteers would be unable for various reasons to continue to serve in the Territorial Army. On the other hand a National Army, with a clear and definite sphere of action marked out for it, would appeal to many men who hitherto had held aloof because they believed, rightly or wrongly, that the Volunteers were not and never had been taken seriously by the military authorities. Then again compulsory service had been mentioned. He himself was opposed to any form of compulsion, but there were many people who were asking why 300,000 men should be asked to bear the burden, to make sacrifices for home defence, and whether the burden ought not to be borne by the whole of our male adult population. But whatever scheme might be introduced, compulsory or voluntary, the burden would still be borne by 300,000 men; it was the quality that would vary. Provided the officers were efficient, the quality of a force composed of men who served from patriotic motives and from love of soldiering would be very much better than that of a force composed of men who were compelled to serve.

All good citizens were to some extent called upon to make sacrifices, and he saw no reason why a sufficient number of men should not welcome the opportunity to render effective service for their country. Public opinion rightly directed for the next decade would do more to bring a useful territorial force suited to our needs into being than any amount of compulsion would be able to accomplish. He had spoken of public opinion, and he hoped the women of Britain would use their influence to make the scheme a success. Their patriotism was one of our greatest national assets, and they could do much to help. After all, this was a matter which intimately concerned them. The Territorial Army was essentially a force for the protection of our hearths and homes, and it was in no sense an aggressive force. When he said that he did not mean that the National Army would never be called upon to take the offensive. In war the most effective defence was that known as the defensive offensive. In certain eventualities it might happen that part of the Territorial Army would be asked to volunteer to serve abroad in order to take the offensive. To some hon. Members that might seem a strange rôle for a non-aggressive army to play. It was not so really, because under certain conditions a blow delivered at an enemy oversea would be the most effective method of protecting our own shores. Another objection was that this territorial scheme would involve the putting of the Militia, the Yeomanry and the Volunteer Forces into the melting pot, and it was said that there would be produced a mixture of unknown quality called a Territorial Army. It was quite true that the several parts of the Auxiliary Forces would be welded into a National Army organised in a scientific manner. There might be differences as to whether the number of men required would be obtained, and perhaps on other points, but surely if experts were worth anything at all they should have no difficulty in forming a sound judgment as to the quality of the force which would be created under the scheme. There was every reason to suppose the special contingent officers and men would be better trained and would reach a higher level of proficiency than the Militia had done, at any rate during the last twenty-five years. He saw no reason why esprit de corps should not flourish in the new Army. In his opinion it would become broader and deeper, because each man in addition to his esprit de corps for his own regiment would develop a pride in and affection for the National Army as a whole. Whilst that Army would on the one hand encourage healthy emulation between corps, it would on the other hand obliterate invidious distinctions between different branches of the services. He again appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to move very cautiously in the creation of mobile Volunteer Artillery, and to give the matter further consideration. Some time ago the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War compared gunners to theologians. He at any rate was not dogmatic in this matter, having had experience by means of his sense perceptions, and could not therefore be bracketed with the theologians. If Volunteer field batteries were to be created he sincerely hoped it would be done very gradually; any step in that direction should be in the nature of an experiment.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) said the hon. Member for Stoke had compared the French and British officers, but without saying anything derogatory to the French officers he thought we had nothing to be ashamed of in our own officers. With one statement of the hon. Member, however, he cordially agreed. The hon. Gentleman had said that those who served in the Territorial Army should be more highly paid than those who served in the Regular Army. With that he agreed, for the reason stated by the hon. Member. It seemed to him that the scheme of the county associations was likely to be successful, and he hoped it would be, but whenever he spoke to a soldier upon the question he always received the same reply. On the previous night he asked a distinguished General Officer what he thought of the Bill and the scheme, and the reply was that it was a capital scheme, that not a man would be obtained to serve under such conditions, and that then we should have to have conscription, which was what the Army wanted. That was the view of many soldiers, and it was the danger which he was anxious to avoid. Unless they were prepared to give the best terms and good pay, and to make sure that those who served in the Territorial Army were not treated in a way which they would think unfair, there would be the danger of the country saying "This is not good enough," and we should be driven to conscription. He strongly opposed compulsion so long as we could get a voluntary force. From the figures given by the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire he understood that the Yeomanry were to receive 10s. 8d. per day instead of 10s. 9d. as at present, so that the Yeoman would be only a penny the worse off.

Mr. ACLAND said he made several qualifications of that statement.

Mr. LANE-FOX said that in spite of the qualifications of the hon. Member there would be a considerable difference between the payment made to the Yeoman in the future and that made in the past.

Mr. ACLAND said the difference would not be anything like so much as the hon. Member would seem to suggest.

Mr. LANE-FOX said in that case he wished the War Office memoranda had been a little more explicit, because the impression given by them was that the Yeomanry would suffer a considerable loss, and in consequence there was considerable unrest and discontent in the Yeomanry with regard to the new conditions suggested. He hoped the Secretary of State would take the opportunity of explaining that the scheme was not what it was thought to be in this regard, and that it afforded a much better prospect for the Yeomanry in the future than was generally anticipated. The House ought to be particularly careful in dealing with the Yeomanry, because, although men could be obtained who with a short course of training would become competent infantry soldiers, unless a particular class was appealed to we could not obtain an effective force of men who could shoot and ride. Such men were not easy to find, and unless young farmers, butchers, well-to-do clerks, veterinary surgeons, and others who had an opportunity of living among and learning the habits of horses were appealed to we should not get men who with a short training would become effective Yeomanry. A horseman could not be made in a fortnight, and if the pay was reduced and the comfort of the men diminished the right hon. Gentleman would run the risk of getting the wrong class of men. He therefore hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to modify his views in this matter. The question of having a Regular adjutant was most important. It was far more important to have a Regular adjutant under the new scheme than under the present system. He did not believe it was possible, especially in the case of the Yeomanry regiments, which had to cover a large area, to get men effectively to carry out the duties required for £100 a year and to carry on their civilian duties as well. Another important point was that no provision had been made for rifle ranges, which were one of the crying needs of the Yeomanry at the present time, and the provision of which would do more than anything else to make the Yeomanry effective. The right hon. Gentleman had appealed to the country gentlemen to find rifle ranges, and that appeal would be responded to now as such appeals had been responded to in the past. But they could not help feeling that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were doing their best to undermine and kill the patriotism of the country gentlemen by their actions in the House. Here, however, was an opportunity for them to show that they realised the influence of the country gentlemen in matters of this kind, and had a higher appreciation of it than they were sometimes willing to admit. The appeal which had been made would be responded to, but he hoped the Secretary of State would not set them too hard a task. If the right hon. Gentleman was not prepared to make the conditions of those who served in the Territorial Army sufficiently good; if he was going to endeavour to run the Territorial Army on the cheap, and get a voluntary service at less than it was worth, he would not get the response he hoped for. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Newport

Division of Shropshire that Yeomen wished to make money out of training. If that were true at all it was in only a small proportion of cases. What the Yeomen wanted was comfort and not to be out of pocket; and he certainly hoped that he would be allowed full dress for walking out. Everybody knew the value of that. If the Yeomen were treated fairly the right hon. Gentleman might rely on having the force maintained at its present strength, a thoroughly efficient and strong force. Therefore he would press the right hon. Gentleman not to level down but to level up this and other branches of the service in order to make them strong and efficient.

*MR. A. L. LEVER (Essex, Harwich) thought that the Bill was the most serious attempt made for many years to consolidate our strength and to convert the forces of this country into a real fighting machine. But it appeared to him that there was one weakness, which had been debated at very considerable length, and which he wanted to emphasise. When all was said and done they must judge of the measure, not by its strongest, but by its weakest link. The plan enunciated by the right hon. Gentleman to transform the various independent and disconnected units into one homogeneous whole must commend itself to anyone who had at all considered the subject. In fact it was a matter of surprise to him that the present system had been allowed to grow up under successive War Ministers untouched: a system while it made provision for training the troops, made no provision for providing the supplementary auxiliary services, which were absolutely essential if those disunited units were ever to be called upon to take the field. The plan devised by the right hon. Gentleman was an admirable one if it could be carried out successfully, but for his own part he was rather doubtful whether that could be done unless the pay of the rank and fife was materially increased. If it failed, as he feared it would, unless they saw an augmentation in the grants, then he feared that they were face to face with an inevitable condition of things, which, if it was not to be conscription as they had it in continental countries, would be some form of compulsory training. The success of the whole of this proposal must necessarily depend upon obtaining the required recruits. Now was it to be expected that under the conditions which they were offering—offering very little and asking for a great deal—that they would obtain a sufficiency of men. Even assuming that patriotism was running high, that the martial spirit was dominant, and that militarism was for the hour as it had never been before, even under those conditions he did not think that a sufficient number of men would be found who could afford to make a sacrifice of eight or fifteen days work for the remuneration offered under this scheme. Their wages might be high in certain districts and in given trades, but if they took the average wage of working men in towns and cities and rural districts he thought they would find that there was a very small margin for them to provide for themselves in such a way as to enable them to make the sacrifice that this system would involve. He acknowledged that the same rate of wages was to be granted as in the Regular service, but then the conditions existing with the men of the two services would be absolutely different. A man might enter the Army because he was unable to get work, but when he did enter the Army he would get 365 days pay in the year, whereas the man of the Territorial Army might, in civil life, be out of work, or only partially employed for a considerable portion of the year or for some portion of the year. Then he might be a married man and have his home to maintain. Was it likely that when his period of training came round, and when perhaps he was in a good job, that he would be prepared to sacrifice fifteen days pay in order to undertake the obligation on the unremunerative terms which were offered? Personally he did not think that he would, and therefore he feared that they would not get the requisite number of men. If the Bill was to accomplish the hopes of the Secretary for War he appealed to him to consider the rate of pay of all arms of the new Territorial Force. He recognised full well the elasticity that was provided by the Bill—an elasticity which, he thought, commended itself to all sides of the House. This elasticity permitted of the annual training being abandoned altogether if necessary, but the moment they did that they were in a worse position than, or in an equally bad position, as they were to-day; our Territorial Force would certainly be no better than the Volunteer force was at the present moment. Then they were asked to imagine that the county associations would stimulate recruiting. Possibly they would to a small extent, but they could not possibly stimulate it to the required extent unless they had the necessary funds at their command. No one deprecated more than he did any suggestion of a raid on the National Exchequer, because he felt with many Members of the House that the first thing they had to do was to make some provision for what the people of this country had so long and so anxiously been waiting for, and which he hoped would come in the very near future, and that was a scheme of old-age pensions. As to the question of the adjutants, he felt that if they abandoned the professional adjutant connected with the regiment they would certainly be making a great mistake. After the remarks of the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire, he understood that it would be altered, and that they would have, as it were, a second adjutant attached to the regiment. For his own part he did not care much whether the adjutant belonged to the Regular force or to the Territorial Force, but he thought he should be in any case a man thoroughly qualified to occupy the position and to carry out the duties. Therefore, he considered that before any adjutant was appointed to a regiment he should undergo some examination to prove that he was specially qualified for the position. The Bill seemed to resolve itself into a choice of one of two things: inadequate pay, which would lead us, he thought, without much doubt, to a system of compulsory training; or, adequate pay, which would lead us to the realisation and consummation of a great scheme, that would hand down the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War as that of a man who had grappled with a great and complex question and had solved it to the advantage of the nation and of the Empire at large.

MR. GUY BARING (Winchester) said that some surprise had been expressed on the other side of the House at the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Dover, but he had no hesitation in giving that Amendment his support. Still he did not wish to see the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman wrecked, because he thought there was a great deal in it of the utmost value. They on the Opposition side of the House had had two shots at Army reform, and he was ready to help the right hon. Gentleman in his shot. But he was not confident that this scheme would give an adequate support to the Regular Army in time of war; and for this reason, that the right hon. Gentleman had done away with the Militia and had not substituted for it a better force. The Government appeared to be particularly fond, to judge from the words of the hon. Member for the Richmond Division of Yorkshire, of the seventy-four third battalions which were to produce the draft units when war broke out. What training would the men of those battalions have had? When those men were sent to fill the gaps in the Regular force not one of them would ever have seen his officers or his comrades, and as far as he could see the men would have been trained in the depots. They would never have seen the battalions on parade, and the drafts instead of being of assistance would certainly for three months be a dead weight, and men in the battalions would have to be told off to complete the training of the men, thus putting a double duty upon them. He believed that to be one of the great faults of the scheme. He thought it would be proved, and that the right hon. Gentleman would have to acknowledge it, that that scheme was going to cost more than had been suggested, and from what he had heard in the debate he was certain that there was a school of thought which would induce the right hon. Gentleman, if possible, to finance the scheme at the expense of the Regular Army, and they would see further reductions of the Regular Army asked for. The force which had been most fiercely attacked was the expeditionary force of 160,000 men. Of that expeditionary force, his one ewe lamb, the right hon. Gentleman had every right to be proud. He certainly hoped that no attack made on the Regular force would induce the Secretary of State to reduce that expeditionary force by even one man. He had pointed out two dangers of the scheme, and now he would point to one of its advantages, namely, that it brought the Army more into popular touch. He had no hesitation in saying that a soldier in time of peace was thought very little of, and military opinion carried little weight. The ordinary man at an election meeting would sooner listen to a politician than to the warnings of any soldier. He thought this scheme would do away with that state of things, and that in future authority in military matters would come from the people. When that came about he believed they would have the national defence of the country nearest to the people's hearts, and the voice crying in the wilderness would not be that of men like Lord Roberts, but that of men like the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said that possibly the Secretary of State for War would like to hear from a Member who had recently visited his constituency what sort of an impression the scheme had made upon a well-known military district. Welshpool was a district famous for soldiers in the past, and it had provided a great many men for the Auxiliary Forces, as well as large contributions to the Regulars. The march of Shropshire and Montgomeryshire, which gave the great Lord Clive, could and would find many a good soldier yet. He thought it was most important to know what the Volunteers and the class which supplied them thought of this new scheme. He was glad to be able to tell the right hon. Gentleman, after having been at great pains to find out, that they thought very well of his plans in his constituency, and the Volunteers in particular seemed to be extremely well satisfied. The people he represented were high spirited and patriotic, and did not look upon soldiering as a degrading profession. They were not in favour of conscription, but they were in favour of a system under which men who were strong and well enough to serve should have an opportunity given to them of serving their country under a voluntary system. Consequently they approved of the scheme in so far as it related to the Volunteers. He did not find in his constituency the state of things which the hon. Member for Walsall said existed, namely, a total want of interest in such a subject as this. In the Montgomery district he found the keenest interest taken in what was contemplated under this scheme for the Volunteers, but he was not in a position to say that he found that the Militia were as pleased with the scheme as the Volunteers. He was not competent to go into details of this question such as a soldier might discuss, but he might, he thought, venture to state that both the Militia and the Volunteers were anxious that the professional adjutant should be retained. He thought opinion was pretty unanimous upon that point. In view of the feeling engendered when the Cardwell reforms were introduced he expressed the hope that the present nomenclature would in some way be retained as far as possible, because he thought it was essential that names should be retained which would preserve as far as possible the individuality of the present regiments which was precious to the members of those particular regiments, because esprit de corps, and proper pride in individuality were conducive to discipline and to everything else that went to make a good fighting battalion. He did not know what the Secretary of State for War's intention was in that respect, and he was afraid that a Question which he put on the Paper recently was not very adroitly put, because he did not succeed in getting the desired information. If the right hon. Gentleman would bear in mind that there was a strong feeling on this subject, his object in raising it would have been attained. With regard to the Yeomanry, he believed there was a feeling existing such as had been referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Newport, that it would be a great pity to deprive them during the period of training of anything which would tend to make that time a pleasant outing as well as a useful military training. He was inclined to think the Yeomanry would rejoice if the more stringent canteen regulations, or whatever they were, would be modified and matters left more upon the present footing. He was himself a supporter of the Bill, and he mentioned these matters because he knew the Volunteers in his own district favoured the scheme and were quite ready to come forward to make it a success in a public spirited manner. He thought it only right to tell the right hon. Gentleman that he believed, though he did not feel here upon such firm ground, that the other two branches of the force also shared this feeling but with reservation, and in his county he believed the men would come forward to serve their country under the new scheme. It had been suggested to him by gentlemen well competent to express opinions that some little extra privileges might be given to Volunteers, and one of the things suggested was that those who joined under the new scheme should be exempted from jury service. Another suggestion was that a bonus of something like £5 should be given to them, such as was given to Regulars when they took their discharge or went into the Reserve. If the right hon. Gentleman would consider those two suggestions he would be greatly obliged to him. He had heard some doubts expressed as to the value of these county committees, but so far as his own inquiries went, he would like to inform the House that he had heard nothing but good of them, and the general belief which had been expressed was that they would be very valuable recruiting agencies. He believed that employers would be ready and willing to give, within reasonable limits, and subject to certain remarks he had to make, such extensions of holidays as might be required, and they were quite ready to fall in with the spirit of the new scheme. Of course, after all, success must depend upon the Volunteers themselves. With regard to what the hon. Member for Richmond had said about the Lancashire Artillery Militia he thought it was only fair to state that that was not a representative, but a hybrid corps, in which there were a great many artillery men and officers from the line, and he was afraid the House would be likely to be misled if it took that corps as a typical Artillery Militia corps. He would not urge at the present time upon the House and the country the great expense which would be incurred by arming the Artillery Militia with a better gun, and he could not see against whom they were likely to have to use it, so long as they kept the Fleet up to the proper mark. But it was necessary that all branches of our Army, Regular or Auxilliary, infantry or artillery, should learn to shoot straight and that there should be no savings effected in the supply of powder. The greatest peacemaker living, President Roosevelt, said that the best way to keep peace was to learn to shoot straight. He thought it was highly necessary that practice with the guns should be developed as much as possible. The other day he was reading a recent account of the Chinese Army. It seemed that upon one occasion a perplexed general invoked the aid of the god of war, and instead there appeared someone more like the god Bacchus. The colonel said that what he wanted was the god of war, but he received the reply that the god of war was otherwise engaged, and that the visitor was the target god, and as none of the Chinese artillerymen or other soldiers had ever done him any harm in their lives he had come to see what help he could give the general in his turn. They did not want the target god in this country to be on the best possible terms with the artillery of the Territorial Army or any other force, and he believed that money should be forthcoming and arrangements should be made for a proper and sufficient practice for the artillery of the Territorial Army. There was one other matter which he would like to mention, and that was the references to India made in the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean.

And, it being a quarter past Eight of the clock, further proceeding was postponed without Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 4.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES AND LAND PURCHASE.

*MR. TOULMIN (Lancashire, Bury) rose to call attention to the powers of purchasing and holding land enjoyed by local authorities, and to move a Resolution declaring that, in the opinion of the House, a measure was urgently needed enabling local authorities to acquire by agreement or compulsorily land needed for the requirments of the inhabitants, the purchase price being definitely based upon the value at which such land was assessed for purposes of taxation. This question, he said, lay at the root of all the social questions with which they had to deal. There was too much rather than too little evidence on the question, the inquiries held from time to time into small holdings, rural housing, and town holdings, and other matters, having shown how the inability to buy land affected the whole of the local authorities of the country. Most students of the question were familiar with their Reports. Nor was it necessary to give the House statistics of overcrowding in towns and in the country districts. The difficulty arose from the nature of the land, which was different from every other necessity of life. It was the basis of all life and industry; it was indispensable to all men and could not be made by any man; and position was of the essence of its value—it could not be moved; water, building materials, and food could be brought in to supply a scarcity. The possession of land also gave an arbitrary power over the persons and the property of the inhabitants which it was the duty of the State to diminish rather than protect. This power was intensified in cities. In a debate which took place in that House in 1890 the present Lord Chancellor said—

> "Urban land had a special increment in value which arose solely when it became vitally necessary in the interest of a congested population, and it was that which differentiated it from all other classes of property."

It was this vital factor in modern life which was left in the hands of private owners to withhold from use at their own irresponsible will except after long and costly processes for some definite scheme. The evils of the existence of this tyrannical power became more unbearable as cities grew. Industries and labour engaged therein centred more and more in cities. Almost all cities and all industries lived, as it were, in a hostile country. Every town was beleaguered, was in a state of siege, and if it desired to expand its dwellings or works it must pay ransom to the surrounding landholders, who, as such, preyed only on its vitality and did not increase its prosperity. These things had been said before by, he believed, every member of the Ministry from the latest recruit on the Treasury bench to the Lord Chancellor and the Premier. In his great appeal to the country the Premier said that the land should become less of a pleasure ground for the rich, and more of a treasure house for the people. One might transpose the statement and say that the land should become less of a treasure house for the rich, and more of a pleasure ground for the people. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had in a speech denounced the present system which enabled a landowner capriciously, or from a mistaken sense of his own interest, to refuse to allow the use of his land for building and other purposes, though it was absolutely necessary for the due development of the community. The right hon. Gentleman had further stated that there was no power vested in the community to obtain the land which was so essential to its life and health, and that while the land was lying idle it did not contribute, under our law, a single penny to defray the growing expenses of the community. Even if the owner did sell, it only widened the lines of circumvallation within which the poor must dwell. The poor man must live near his work, but the rich man could daily escape to cheaper land. Again, if the landlord did sell, it was not by one single indemnity but successive indemnities, inch by inch almost, that the right to live and the right to work was bought. If the community by one great indemnity on any reasonable basis could ransom its life from the restraining bonds in which it was held the cost would be soon recouped. The Secretary of State for India, in supporting the Motion by the present Lord Chancellor in 1890, said that if Mills's advice had been taken in 1870 or so "enough would have been intercepted to meet the demand of a great society like the Metropolis." He would instance one or two cases to show the difference to the city possessing land instead of being in the hands of such a landlord as he had described. In 1635 Lord Molyneux purchased the lordship of Liverpool for £450, and speedily began to assert his rights. The corporation resented this, and bought of him a lease of 1,000 acres in Lord Street district for 999 years, at a fixed rental of £30. Recently a small plot at the corner of Exchange Street was sold at a rate equal to £1,093,840 per acre. Fifty years ago the annual value of this 1,000 acres was estimated to be £50,000. In 1837 Liverpool owned an estate worth £3,000,000; in the last forty-five years that estate had doubled in value. The result of this far reaching policy had been that last year Liverpool had an amount of £147,000 from land and buildings to set against the rates, amounting to a reduction of 10d. in the pound. In his own town of Preston the burgesses obtained certain rights under King John, they were continued under Henry II. at a fixed rent, and the inhabitants bought the fee farm rent from the Commonwealth for a comparatively small sum. It was bought over again from Charles II. with impartial loyalty. That land had been of tremendous value to Preston for their parks, electricity works, destructors, etc., and there had been a constant check on land speculation. In the parish of Plumstead an estate of 250 acres was valued in 1845 when the income was £750, at about £15,000. An increase in the Government works at Woolwich necessitated additional house accommodation and this increase was inevitable, and not speculative. If the locality could have purchased the estate what would have been the position now? The income was now £15,000 per annum. By 1915, when the seventy years leases expired the landlord would have received about £1,000,000 in additional rent, and in less than ten years he would get property worth £1,000,000 by reversion. The descendants of the men who built the property would have nothing. He would like to refer to what had taken place in New Zealand. There large estates were given over to sheep and a few hired labourers. Many owners sat down and waited for the Government to build roads, railways, and bridges, when they would be able to realise at a profit. The Government met the emergency. Measures were taken to prevent that being done, and where there were formerly a few hired shepherds there were now hundreds if not thousands of settlers. What were the present powers of local authorities? Generally it might be taken as a working principle that land was only to be acquired by corporations under the authority of a statute, and then only sufficient for a specific purpose. The power given was only compulsory where the object to be attained was of great and pressing importance, and where there would be obvious difficulty in getting land by agreement. In other cases the power was generally merely given to purchase land in the open market. In almost every case these powers had, for some reason or other, been very jealously limited by Parliament, and care always seemed to be exercised to prevent local authorities taking more land than was strictly necessary for their immediate purpose. What was more, an owner was able to force the local authority to purchase the whole of his property; but the local authority was bound to sell the surplus. There were also certain special powers for allotments, housing, small holdings, etc., but the Acts were full of restrictions and of provisions which obstructed their working. If land was bought for one purpose, the whole process had to be gone over again if that land were devoted to another purpose; whereas a private owner bought land out and out. The one thing which seemed to be denied to the local authorities was the exercise of foresight and intelligent anticipation of future needs. However inevitable expansion might be, land could only be acquired by local authorities by a definite scheme and plan backed by Provisional Order or Bill, with full notice to everybody and after the civic war of the arbitration court. Let them take some cases of the expense of purchase. The Glasgow Corporation required for an improvement sixty yards of ground. £700 was asked for it, and £122 was awarded by the arbiters. The expenses of the purchase, however, paid by the Corporation amounted to £1,052—£407 for the claimant, £365 for the arbiters, and £280 expenses incurred by the corporation. There was another case in which £1,000 was claimed, and £279 was granted; while the expenses amounted to £460. Efforts had been made to reduce these costs by limited arbitration. At Bury a couple of cottages were bought for widening a roadway, at a cost of £115; and the arbitration expenses reached £43 14s. 4d. Then in the case of the Water Board there were eight arbitrations, and it was agreed that only one arbitrator should sit; no counsel or solicitors were employed, and only one witness in each case was called. Yet the cost of buying land to the value of £10,525 reached £836. In another case a farm was bought for £1,670, and the cost of the purchase amounted up to £288. A small country public-house was valued at £1,780, and the arbitration expenses amounted to £608. However absurd the claims of the owner might be, the corporation had always to pay the cost. In regard to the expense of purchase of land in the country, he would take the case mentioned by Sir Edmund Verney, who said—

> "We have a system of land encumbrances built up during many generations by the most skilful lawyers the world has ever seen. With the result that when a labourer, or a farmer, or a small capitalist wants to buy a plot of land for a small holding, he finds even a willing landowner helplessly enmeshed in settlements, mortgages, charges, and claims, which choke his every effort."

Of this Sir Edmund Verney gave the following amusing example—

> "A few years ago after selling a row of four cottages with small gardens attached, I went to the solicitor for my money, and he presented me with his bill showing that the expense of the sale had not only swallowed up the whole of the purchase money, but that a sum of £25 was still owing to him."

Those difficulties would always exist until a sound Valuation Bill was brought in, and passed into law. A good many people thought that a Valuation Bill might supply a basis—not fix—but be a basis for the actual price to be given to the owner of the land purchased, be a factor in determining the purchase money. Neither the national nor local taxation assessment bore any relation to the price the public had to pay for land. Valuation for death duties bore no relation to the price which the nation must pay if it found that it wanted a site for a barracks, say on Salisbury Plain. Assessments for local taxation bore no relation to the price of land if that were required for water works. A Valuation Bill had been promised which should secure a separate land valuation bearing a just relation to the value of the land, and the price to be paid for it. There would necessarily be certain expenses for severance and removal; but the dominant factor should be the valuation for local and national taxation. That would enable the public to purchase land at a fair value. If the assessment was not fair, let it be made fair. He and his hon. friends who supported the Resolution were not proposing that the landlord should be taxed out of existence, though that charge was sometimes made against them. But even that might not be inequitable if the process was sufficiently long drawn out. However, he would not argue that point now. What they wanted was that the purchase should be made at a fair price. No raven on a withered branch need croak "confiscation" at the resolution he had moved. But if confiscation was mentioned they must look at both sides. When Leeds was undertaking a great waterworks scheme, the city required 400 acres, which had been rated at 10s. an acre. But the price asked for that land was very nearly £200,000, or at the rate of 998 years purchase. The effect of that was to decrease the chance of employment and to increase the cost of living in Leeds. There was nobody in Leeds who had not some part of his earnings confiscated by such a price. The Postmaster-General in a recent speech said that—

> "The existing state of things was confiscation of the property of the community by a few individuals."

SIR F. BANBURY: Might I ask what Leeds did pay for the land?

*MR. TOULMIN said he could not say.

SIR F. BANBURY: What they asked does not matter.

*MR. TOULMIN thought it did matter. It showed what the landlords thought they were entitled to extort from the community. He would not ask at the present moment how those landowners had got this power, or on what terms they had obtained the land. He made no charge against persons, but he did charge the House of Commons with too long allowing this question to remain unsolved. Another charge which was made in regard to the change which he advocated was that if the powers of public bodies were extended they would be more than ever open to jobbery. He ventured to suggest that the more the plunder, the more the corruption; and that if the plunder were decreased, the jobbery would decrease. The experience of other countries proved this, and that the extended powers given to local authorities for the purchase of land rather tended to extinguish the mere speculator. It was feared that there might be wholesale land speculation by local authorities. He did not think that was well founded, because local authorities were rather difficult to move, than prone to rush into rash ventures. He maintained that our municipalities and county councils were conservative in action. In his opinion, land reform should take the direction of increasing the powers of the local authorities who could safely be trusted. In the cities they had vaster problems to face than were recorded in any previous age. Our civilisation would either sink or develop into a finer flower than the world had ever yet known. With its attention distracted in a hundred ways, the House of Commons could not be the directing force. That must be found in the patriotic labours of the foremost citizens of great cities whose hands the House should not tie. This was not a political move on the part of himself and the supporters of the Resolution. The problem was pressing on every growing municipality. Five hundred and fifty rating authorities had joined to support the committee working for the taxation of ground values, and they were looking forward to a Government Valuation Bill. The House had no time to ascertain the needs of localities; the localities themselves must have powers to deal with the evils in their midst. In cities power should be given to the local authority to foresee their development, to lay out the land which would be occupied in the future, to extend the industrial area, to crush the slums without imposing an intolerable financial burden on the community. In the country a career ought to be found for the labourer, who should have a public authority to ensure security for the cottage in which he dwelt. Did hon. Members ever think of the brooding uncertainty of a country labourer who was a weekly tenant, and knew not when he might lose his cottage, or where he could go afterwards? If Parliament did its duty the gross tyranny of such a case as was mentioned by the present Lord Chancellor when he moved his Resolution on land values in 1890 would be impossible. That was the case of a Devonshire village, the inhabitants of which bore the same names as were recorded in Domesday Book. The landlord considered that it was too expensive to re-build the cottages of the fisherfolk which were falling into disrepair; and half the population was driven away, because the fisherfolk did not work for the farmers on the landlord's land. If the county council were given compulsory powers to buy land they would have a ready instrument by which to fight such tyranny as that. He had passed a self-denying ordinance as to the time that he thought a Member ought to occupy in moving a Resolution such as this. He had reached that limit, and would therefore beg to move.

*MR. WALTERS (Sheffield, Brightside), in seconding the Resolution, said it was only necessary for him to occupy a short time, because the proposer had dealt with the subject in a very comprehensive manner. He had proposed to quote a number of figures, but he would content himself with giving an illustration in one concrete case. It had reference to a town of over 200,000 population, of which he had very close and intimate knowledge. He took the trouble sometime ago carefully to collect figures from conveyances and legal documents as to the value of unbuilt-on land adjacent to houses, and he found that between 1872 and 1902 the value had increased to such an extent that the increase if capitalised at 3 per cent. yielded a sufficient sum of money not only to pay the entire rates of the borough, but to leave a considerable sum of money for distribution among the ratepayers. These figures came upon him with such overwhelming force that he decided he would do everything he could to help forward the increase of power for the purchase of land by local authorities and municipalities generally. That was a phenomenal case, but, to a lesser extent, in the last fifty years, in all the large centres of population, that sort of thing had gone on, and it would continue to go on, and the improved land values would go in an increasing proportion into the pockets of private landowners unless the House of Commons intercepted at least a portion of that value. He did not blame the landlords. They only did what business men would do; they took advantage of opportunities for making money. He blamed the House of Commons for depriving local authorities and municipalities of the power of preventing these men making money. The question was, ought local authorities to have such a power? Why should power be given to local authorities for specific and not for general purposes? One strong reason why they should have these powers was that the aggregation of population in large centres was responsible for this increase of land values, while that very aggregation threw upon the local authorities a large expenditure in reference to public health and other matters. It seemed to him that if that increase in values, and the increased expenditure of local authorities were effects of the same cause, surely those two effects might be made interdependent, and the increased value of land in a large town should be used to meet at least some of the expenditure which the aggregation of population in large centres involved. The present state of things imposed a burden upon private enterprise, but always when they asked for increased power for municipalities or the State, vested interests stepped in and said that to give it would check enterprise and injure trade and commerce. In this case the exact reverse would be the result, because trade and commerce were seriously hampered by the high prices which had to be paid for land, and still more by the heavy rates which had to be paid in order to deal with the problems which these large centres of population created. He need not dwell upon the housing difficulty, but he would say that the private ownership of land upon which large houses, great works, and business premises had to be built, meant a considerable burden upon and was a serious check to private industry. The Resolution would not involve confiscation. They were not suggesting that the local authorities should appropriate the land, but that they should pay for it. He did not think the strongest advocate of the rights of property would suggest that it was the skill and energy of the landlords which had created these values. It was the skill and energy of the community which had created them. The owner of the land might have exercised the faculty of foresight or have been wise enough to select as a father or grandfather somebody who owned land, but the increased wealth was created by the community and they ought not to allow the landowner to step in and take it. There were some cases in which the wealth was clearly purely communal or social, and there were other cases in which the wealth was purely the result of private enterprise; but he ventured to suggest that the growth in land values, in consequence of the growth of population, was not in any sense the result of private enterprise, but was directly the result of the efforts of the community, and was social or communal wealth, which ought to belong to the community at large. He could understand someone saying that the proposed powers would not be used with discretion and judgment, but there was the German example to refer to. There were German towns where they had actually realised the dream which he had indulged in. In regard to some of these towns, they had actually paid all the rates and had a balance to distribute among the fortunate ratepayers. That was not only the case in Germany, but many towns in this country had promoted omnibus Bills under which they had purchased large tracts of land compulsorily and had acquired powers to reclaim, develop and lease them; in those cases the process had been conducted very successfully and a considerable sum of money had been the result. It was not likely that if these powers were granted to local authorities they would enter into competition and become rash speculators. What was proposed was not that county councils or corporations should buy and sell land, going into the market buying one day and selling another, but they wanted them to take the place of the ground landlords and acquire land, hold and lease it for building purposes, the erection of houses, great works, and business premises generally. If the powers were granted they must be exercised in a satisfactory manner, because before a municipality could buy any tract of land they must formulate their scheme, and submit it to the central authority, who would consider whether it was a wise and prudent scheme, whether they were giving a reasonable price, and whether they had a reasonable prospect of making the scheme successful. He would go even further than that, and say that the powers of purchase should be limited to a sum proportionate to the rateable value of the locality. That was not a revolutionary proposal at all; it was a cautious, moderate, and even a conservative scheme, and ought to win the assent of even the most cautious Member of the House. If the cases of any of our large towns were examined, Members would be amazed at the prices paid for sites for police stations, libraries, post offices, and for acquiring open spaces and parks, and for other ordinary public purposes — prices largely in excess of those for which the property could have been purchased a few years earlier. It was not, therefore, a matter of spending enormous sums of money, but of buying land at the right time, from the right person — from the original owner instead of from the land speculator—and at the right price. He ventured to say that if the powers thus conferred were judiciously exercised in the way he had indicated nothing could benefit the general community more, for in such a case the local authority simply became the ground landlord. He would just point out one or two other incidental advantages which would come from such a scheme. It would in the first place steady the price of land in the locality. In growing towns there were alarming and rapid increases of price from the standpoint of the purchaser, although they were very gratifying from the standpoint of the vendor. Those behind the scenes knew that little arrangements were arrived at between the landowners who controlled the market, and they simultaneously raised the price of land. If the proposed power were given to local authorities they could acquire tracts of land, and, fixing the price in a reasonable manner, steady the market and prevent other landowners from charging excessive prices. They could also prevent by compulsion land being held out of the market. That was a very serious difficulty in many districts in the North of England, especially in Lancashire, where towns had been dwarfed and stunted because they could not buy certain estates, and instead of going forward in a natural area of development they had had to find a way round in other directions. If the Resolution were passed it would prevent the holding of land out of the market and the consequent artificial inflation of prices. The House was well aware that it very often happened that settled estates or encumbered estates became ripe for development, but the owners had no capital to make the roads and place the estate on the market. The only way of obtaining capital in such cases was by the introduction of a land syndicate. To the owners of such estates it would be a positive boon to be able to sell to a local authority who could develop them. From the point of view of the owners of many estates, such powers vested in the local authorities would be a great advantage. With regard to the method of purchase, they did not want the Lands Clauses Act method, with the 10 per cent. added for forced sale and disturbance, and its costly machinery of lawyers and surveyors, which enormously increased the cost of the land to be bought. They wanted some simple, rapid, and fair process. The method proposed in the Resolution suggested or assumed an entire revolution in the method of rating. He did not want to wait for that, he wanted power now. He wanted as soon as possible power to buy land by private treaty and to hold it and lease it and develop it for general building purposes. He believed a large part of the problem would be solved if they had that power. But in addition they must have compulsory powers to bring contumacious landlords to book. If such a man knew that if he did not deal he could be made to deal, he would be a more reasonable person to negotiate with. The matter was not entirely a financial one; there were other matters to consider. However successful they might be in bringing the people back to the land the great majority of the people in this country must always be town dwellers, and therefore the towns should be made as healthy, happy, and comfortable as possible. This was largely a children's question. The present condition of some parts of our cities could not but result in the physical and moral deterioration of those who dwelt in them. The machinery he had outlined would, he believed, work an economic revolution in many of our great towns and cities, and he pleaded for its inauguration in the interests of the amenities of our crowded centres, the health of the children, and the moral and material well-being of the community generally. He cordially seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, a measure is urgently needed enabling local authorities to acquire, by agreement or compulsorily, and by simple and inexpensive machinery, such land within or adjoining their several districts as may, in their judgment, be needed for the requirements of the inhabitants; and further that, in all such cases of land acquisition, the purchase price should be definitely based upon the value at which such land is assessed for purposes of taxation."—(Mr. Toulmin.)

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said he had listened very carefully to the two speeches in support of the Motion, and the first thing that impressed itself on his mind was that the speech of the seconder differed materially from that of the proposer, who had said nothing about safeguards. The beautiful picture of "flowers and trees and green grass" drawn by the mover would not be realised, because the unfortunate ratepayer whose local authority adopted the Resolution would find the rates so high under the ordinary conditions of human life in our towns that he would have to go elsewhere. The substitution of one landlord for another would not prevent overcrowding. The hon. Member had pointed to the prosperity of Liverpool, and claimed that it was due to the corporation's having bought land. But the hon. Gentleman did not complete his argument. He would complete it for him, but the result might not be the same. He would take London as an illustration. London had not bought land of its own, but London was just as prosperous as Liverpool, and the rates in London were no higher than in Liverpool.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Dr. MACNAMARA, Camberwell, N.): You ought to have said that during the county council election.

SIR F. BANBURY said that though former governers of Liverpool had purchased land, yet the prosperity of London was as great as the prosperity of Liverpool, and therefore the argument fell to the ground. They could purchase property in London without buying the land, and yet the prosperity of London was just as great as that of the city of Liverpool.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): What part of London—Poplar or the City?

SIR F. BANBURY said they had to take London as a whole. It was perfectly easy to pick out one isolated part, but that would not answer. It was perfectly easy to take parts of Liverpool and parts of London, but that did not alter his argument in the least. They had to to prove first of all that London was not prosperous and that Liverpool was, and, secondly, that the rates of Liverpool were generally lower than the rates of London. He maintained that they could not do either. The hon. Member had given several instances where local authorities had incurred great expense in buying land, and had said that in some instances there had been a big loss. But that had nothing whatever to do with the power of purchasing land. The hon. Gentleman was not content with revolutionising the system of land purchase, but he wanted also to abolish the lawyer. He did not know whether that would be a good thing or not; he was rather afraid to say that it would be a good thing, because of the proximity of his hon. and learned friend on his left. The question before the House was whether the local authority should have power to enter into land speculation at all, whether it should have more powers than it had at present to acquire land, and whether it was advisable to make those powers compulsory. But in any case would the local authorities be able to obtain sufficient money to carry out the powers given to them? Neither mover nor seconder had alluded to the question of finance. They appeared to think local authorities could raise any amount of money. They were completely wrong. The tremendous growth of the debts of municipal authorities made it impossible to borrow except at greatly increased rates of interest. Were local authorities to buy simply because in 200 years time the land might become valuable? It would be difficult to find a local authority with the business capacity to buy exactly the part of the country which was going to increase in value. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that all land was going to increase in value, but local authorities who had bought land in the country thirty or forty years ago would have lost very large sums of money. Land had gone down in value all over the country. Again, what were the possibilities of municipal authorities finding large sums of money at present? The local indebtedness four years ago, excluding Ireland, was £452,000,000, and that did not include the unfunded debt of the municipal authorities. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to think that there was magic in big figures, and that the more they were in debt the happier they would be. He had always looked upon the reverse as the truth. [AN HON. MEMBER: 'What about the assets?'] He would deal with that question presently. The local indebtedness of the country had increased between 1893 and 1903 by no less a sum than £73,000,000. The National Nebt was altogether £742,000,000 as against the £452,000,000 of the local authorities, which did not include their unfunded debt. What was the result? Everyone who knew anything about municipal finance knew that at present municipal authorities were unable to borrow in the market, and had borrowed from their bankers to such an extent that the bankers were refusing to advance any more money on any terms at all. They had been obliged to resort to two or three years' bills in the open market, but had exhausted even that supply, and were in an extremely awkward position.

MR. CHIOZZA-MONEY (Paddington, N.) said the clerks of a number of municipal authorities had informed him that those statements were entirely erroneous.

SIR F. BANBURY said he happened to be a director of a bank, and, although he could not reveal secrets, he could assure the hon. Member that the banking accounts of the municipal corporations told quite a different tale, whatever the chief clerks might say. Where was the profit to come in if the municipalities borrowing money at 3½ per cent. bought land at anything like a fair value? At present everybody knew that manufacturers were heavily rated, and it was said that the owner of the land on which the works were built made a profit. It was argued that if the municipality had bought the land on which those factories stood the rates could have been saved. But how could hon. Gentlemen have it both ways? If the ratepayers were going to make the profits that the landlord had made, then the manufacturers must pay just the same as they did now. Did the hon. Member imagine that municipalities could stretch the land? What he evidently meant was that they would put fewer houses upon it, and if they did that they would get less income. If in these land speculations the municipalities found that they could not make a profit, who would lose? Why, the people living in the other part of the town, who would gain nothing by the transaction, but would have to pay the loss incurred by their neighbours living in a better street. If a man was clever and possessed the foresight to buy land advantageously in some particular locality he might make a fortune out of it, but to suppose that the majority of our municipalities would have the foresight to do the same thing was taxing the belief of any ordinary man beyond the bounds of reason. Municipalities would be dealing with other people's money, and consequently they would be inclined to be venturesome. An instructive experience of municipal land-buying was afforded by the late London County Council's investment in land five years ago in the very centre of London. London was a town that was prospering and growing. Yet this experiment on the part of the County Council had resulted in a heavy loss to the ratepayer, for the land was still vacant. In land speculations, to be successful, they wanted to know when to buy and where to buy, and it was easy to be wise after the event. He intended to divide the House against the Resolution.

*MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich) said that all those who were interested in social reform realised that the land question was one of the most important which could come under the consideration of the House. Land had been called the mother, and labour the father, of all wealth, and it was because they believed the land question to be indissolubly connected with labour that the Labour Members were particularly pleased that this Resolution had been brought under the consideration of the House. Some people were still of the opinion that the private ownership of land was justifiable, but he thought they would all agree with him when he said that social interests ought to prevail over private concerns. To-day they found that municipalities had great need for land, and the great obstacles to the acquirement of the land necessary for their needs were the landlord, private ownership, and the desire to secure fancy prices. There was a general tendency for towns to spread, and he thought the House would readily admit that that was beneficial to the health and in the best interests of the community as a whole. It was not a pleasant spectacle to see people herded together in the condition they were in at present, and he was very anxious that municipalities should be encouraged to erect houses outside their areas, to provide improved methods of transit, and in that way to improve the health of the community. At present municipalities found the acquisition of land very difficult and complicated, and consequently they were asking for further powers in order that the unearned increment which would naturally accrue as the result of the increase in the population and the development of industry should be devoted to the best interests of the community as a whole, and not be allowed to swell the private profits of the land-owning class. In his opinion it was a wrong thing that people should be able to hold land in order to get fancy prices later on. That kind of extortion made the purchase of land by municipalities prohibitive. They were asking in this Resolution that municipalities should have the power not only to purchase land but to hold it in view of the probable development of a particular district. The hon. Baronet who represented the City of London seemed to think that the rates were the one thing which would alarm the people, but he could assure him that the question of rents was a very serious matter for the working classes. It was well known that the enhanced value extorted by landlords where municipalities had been obliged to acquire land was reflected in higher rents than would otherwise have obtained if the land had been secured at a reasonable figure. The demand for a reform of this state of things did not come from one section of the House only. Speaking on 10th February, 1899, Mr. Asquith propounded what he called "a simple and very intelligible programme," and referring to the first item in that programme, he said—

> "In the first place you ought to give to the local authority of every urban community vastly larger powers than it at present possesses for the compulsory acquisition of land upon terms which would make it possible for the community to employ the land so acquired with advantage to its own interest."

They were glad on that occasion to be in hearty accord with that very sound expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He proposed to show the House how the land question vitally affected the life and health of the people. The question of overcrowding had already been touched upon, and he was fearful that even some hon. Members hardly realised the extent to which that evil prevailed in the country. Nearly one-third of the population lived in an overcrowded condition. In 1904 the Manchester Citizens Aid Association published a valuable Report on the housing conditions in Manchester and Salford, which showed that 34,000 overcrowded persons lived in Manchester, and 16,000 in Salford—a total of 60,000 people. The 1901 census showed that London had 300,000 one-room dwellers. The same census figures showed that in the town groups of Scotland there were not less than a million overcrowded one and two-room dwellers. These figures pointed to a prevalent evil, and he felt that if the municipalities were invested with larger powers of land acquisition it would be a direct encouragement to them to go on with the erection of houses outside their particular areas in order to obviate the evil of overcrowding. As to the health of the community, he felt that they were beginning to understand that that was a question closely related to that of the housing of the people. They had come now to know that in consumption, "The Great White Plague," as Oliver Wendell Holmes called it, we had nature's unmistakable protest against the unnatural conditions under which masses of our people lived. The celebrated German scientist, Dr. Koch, said that—

> "it is out of them that the disease always crops up anew;"

> "it is to the abolition of these conditions that we must first and foremost direct our attention if we wish to attack the evil at its root, and to wage war against it with effective weapons."

It was a matter for politicians as well as doctors. Consumption was at bottom a phase of the housing problem, the housing problem was but a phase of the land question. It was not merely an urban question. He believed that in the rural districts something might be done to improve the dwellings of the agricultural population. He thought it was a saddening sight that the agricultural population in some parts were herded into little huts into which many people would not put their dogs or pet animals, while thousands of acres of land were lying idle. A few months ago, through the caprice of a landlord, a relative of his own, an agricultural labourer, received notice to quit his little house, and there was no possibility of securing shelter for his domestic chattels from one end of the town to the other, and yet all around the town there were many acres of land lying idle. The local council had no power to acquire that land in order that the people might be housed. He was glad that the latter part of the Resolution indicated a basis on which such land might be purchased. There were cases which showed how municipalities had been subject to great extortion at the hands of landlords. The Corporation of Leeds some time ago had to purchase from Lord Masham 400 acres. The rateable value of the land was £6,000; the price asked was £196,000; and the price awarded was £46,000. It might be said that, after all, Lord Masham was simply a good business man. Admitting that, he wished to see the municipality exercising equal business capacity on behalf of the community. The Government had occasion some years ago to buy some land from Sir Michael Hicks Beach, now Lord St. Aldwyn. The price demanded and ultimately received was eighty years purchase. He felt that no land reformer advocating a scheme of land purchase would ever give countenance to such an exorbitant price.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) asked whether the hon. Member was aware that the case was submitted to arbitration. It was not a question of extortion.

*MR. GEORGE ROBERTS said he was not concerned whether it was submitted to arbitration or not. He was concerned with the basis of the purchase, and he respectfully submitted that eighty years purchase was a most extortionate price for the nation to have to pay. The Admiralty paid eighty years purchase for land acquired at Rosyth. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham told a Parliamentary Committee that the land acquired by the Birmingham Corporation for the Corporation Street improvement cost £400,000 more than it ought to have done. Mr. S. Laing had estimated that landlords had extorted many millions over the value of the land appropriated to railway purposes. Interest, of course, had to be earned on that capital, and that must reflect itself in the rates charged for transit as well as on the wages of the workers. If municipalities had the power to hold land, they might be able to carry out useful experiments during periods of acute unemployment. He thought the shopkeeper of London pursued a short-sighted policy during the recent County Council election, because whilst the landlords were able to extort in the shape of rent one-third, and in some cases one-half the wages of the workers, it necessarily followed that those workers had much less to spend on the other necessaries of life.

DR. MACNAMARA thought the Motion touched one of the most acute and urgent of the many problems which confronted social reformers. Whether they considered rural depopulation, overcrowding in the great towns, lack of employment, physical deterioration, or, indeed, any one of the dozen other social and economic problems, they found themselves at an early stage of their investigation getting back to the land every time. Perhaps the House would allow him to state how the local authorities stood in respect of the power of compulsorily acquiring land. At the present time local authorities could only acquire land compulsorily for some specific and immediate purpose connected with the performance of their statutory duties. Generally speaking, all local authorities could acquire land under compulsion for carrying out the obligations statutorily laid on them. Except in certain cases, such as electric operations and operations under the Burial Acts, land could be acquired under compulsion. All local authorities, except county councils and parish councils, could compulsorily acquire land under the Public Health Act of 1875; but in that case the Provisional Order must be confirmed by Parliament. All local authorities, except parish councils, could compulsorily acquire land under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. Rural district councils could not acquire land compulsorily under Part 1 of the Act; but in all other cases, if the Provisional Order was not opposed it could be sanctioned by the Local Government Board. He ought to add that in all operations under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, the Provisional Order must be sanctioned by Parliament whether opposed or not. Parish councils under the Local Government Act of 1894 might acquire under compulsion land for burial grounds, public libraries, allotments, recreation grounds, parish rooms, and so on; but in these cases the Provisional Order was secured from the county council and confirmed by the Local Government Board. That was a very short statement of the existing law. As he had said, at present a local authority could only acquire land for some specific and immediate purpose connected with the performance of its statutory duties. Further, a local authority had no power to apply land which it had acquired for one purpose to another purpose inconsistent with the original purpose, although it might be no longer possible to use the land in the way originally intended. In that case, indeed, it appeared to be the primary duty of the local authority under the Lands Clauses Act and Section 175 of the Public Health Act of 1875 to dispose of any land found to be superfluous for the immediate purposes for which it was purchased. From an urban point of view some local authorities naturally enough, especially big urban authorities, complained that in the existing state of the law they were debarred from seizing favourable opportunities for acquiring, at a moderate price, land in the suburbs of their district that might ultimately be required for public purposes, and were compelled to wait until the need for the land had actually arisen, by which time, owing to various causes, such as the increase of population or improvements effected by the local authorities themselves, the value of the property had become advanced. The Town Council of Sheffield a few months since invited other town councils to join in a representation to the effect that these bodies should be enabled to acquire land, when they found suitable opportunities for so doing, and to have adequate borrowing powers without at the same time stating definitely for what particular purpose the land should be used. He understood that forty municipalities joined in that representation. That was the position of the great municipal authorities. But let them take the rural side of the problem. The House had had before it within the last two or three weeks two very remarkable Reports by Select Committees. The first was the Report of the Rural Housing Select Committee, which was presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chippenhan. That Committee reported—

> "No reform in connection with rural housing can be of any effective use unless further facilities for the acquisition of land are given."

Dr. Macnamara.

And then they went on to say that—

And they further pointed out that—

> "Local authorities will often be prepared to pay more than the market value for the land required rather than undergo the uncertainty and delay which a resort to compulsory powers now involves."

They added—

> "No solution will be satisfactory which does not enable local authorities to purchase land compulsorily for any public purpose, including housing, drainage, small holdings, etc., upon a basis of its rateable value."

The principal conclusion of this Rural Housing Committee was that the difficulty of obtaining land was one of the chief causes for rural depopulation. From that they passed to a very significant association between rural depopulation and the problem of town unemployment. The Report set forth that—

> "The Committee have had evidence to show that the greater proportion of persons in distressed circumstances in London and the larger provincial towns—the unemployed and the unemployable—are town bred and not country bred . . . . Out of nearly 10,000 men out of work or in irregular casual employment, as found in Salvation Army and Church Army houses and shelters and in Rowton Houses by the distress committees, and amongst dock labourers, the percentage of town bred men ranged from 86 to 94 per cent. On the other hand, out of the total number of men employed in a selected number of larger undertakings and industries such as the Post Office, police, municipal service, railways, gas works, breweries, stores, etc, early in the year 1906, 46 per cent. were country born."

They arrived at the conclusion, first that rural depopulation sprang, to some extent, from the land problem; and, secondly, that unemployment in towns sprang to some extent out of rural depopulation. The land problem, therefore, and unemployment were very far from being entirely unconnected. He was bound to say, as he had listened to heated discussions in the House on the application of a few thousand pounds for the immediate mitigation of hardship due to unemployment, he had often felt that the real problem before them was the slow and painful process of removing causes of unemployment by wise measures of social reform, not the least amongst which was the serious overhauling of the land problem. Still on the rural side, there was a remarkable Report recently laid upon the Table by the Select Committee on Small Holdings, of which Lord Onslow was Chairman. That Committee made two prime recommendations. First they said—

"That in addition to the machinery provided by the Small Holdings Act, 1892, the provision of small holdings should be assisted by the direct intervention of a central Government Department."

And they added that—

"In the event of the central Government Department, the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, being unable to obtain by agreement land required for these operations compulsory powers should be conferred."

The hon. Member for Leith Burghs made an interesting reservation to the recommendations generally, in the course of which he said—

"It would indeed be an immense advantage were urban communities owners of adjacent lands like the ancient burghs of Scotland and the modern cities of Germany. The use of such land by the urban population, as in France, is with us comparatively unknown, and were the council landowner, with a regular estate policy, all communal interests in cultivation, administration, and revenue would best be served. This simple and effective machinery, while securing existing rights subject only to expropriation where necessary, would amply secure the public interest."

This interesting reference induced him to look abroad for a moment. The House was aware of the fact that for some years many German towns had adopted the policy of steadily acquiring land, and the success of the policy was so marked that a few years ago the Prussian Government issued a rescript to provincial governors to use all their influence to induce all Prussian towns to extend the policy. At the close of 1902, the area of land owned by thirty-one large towns varied from ten to 365 square yards per head of the population. Only seven in the thirty-one had less than twenty-four square yards per head; six had from twenty-four to sixty; nine had from sixty to 120—Berlin had eighty-five—five had from 120 to 240, and four had over 240 square yards per head. Since 1902 nearly all these towns had actively increased their holding. In 1892 there was a very interesting inquiry instituted in certain parts of Germany as to land owned by townships, big or little. The Burgomaster of Treis on the Moselle wrote—

"The Burgomastery of Treis consists of an area of 25,000 acres. Of these more than 12,500 acres belong to the parishes. All local needs are met from the common purse. Then each burgher receives his firing on payment of half or one-third of its value, and twenty-five to thirty acres of cultivable land for his lifetime."

Sigmaringen (Hohenzollern), a place of about 200 households, had 1,050 acres of wood and 1,650 acres of meadow and cultivable land. The current local taxes were covered from the revenue, a sum of £63 was given for common purposes, a sum of £133 was devoted to paying the State taxes of the burghers, and 1,700 cubic metres of firewood were divided among them. Phillipsburg (Baden), with 2,400 inhabitants, had 1,017½ acres of wood and 1,285 acres of meadow and cultivated fields. Görlitz (Schlesia) a town of 83,700 people, owned 77,127½ acres from which in 1892 £33,028 went to common fund. Enkirch on the Moselle with 2,200 inhabitants had about 5,000 acres of land, wood, heath, underwood, and cultivable land. Mixtadt in Posen, in the district of Adelnau, with 3,000 inhabitants, possessed about 1,875 acres of land and had no local rates. He presented this case to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he hoped it would commend itself to them, as they were always so solicitous about the downtrodden ratepayer. He passed from this picture to the state of affairs at home. On 12th January at Newcastle-on-Tyne Viscount Ridley, speaking at a farmers' club, told them that—

"Not far from one-third of the land of the country is owned by the House of Lords in one way or another."

He wondered whether the noble Lord thought that such a state of things as that statement represented could really long continue. To his mind it represented all the dangerously unstable equilibrium of an inverted pyramid. Passing to the Resolution before the House, the proposition was that there should be increased power for the compulsory acquisition of land. The Government agreed to that proposition. It was a weighty experiment, and would have to be carefully safeguarded. Nobody desired that the local authorities should become mere speculators on the security of the rates. But the compulsory acquirement of land for the public well-being was part of the Government's policy. He dared say the cry of confiscation would be raised. It was always raised by those who were doubtful about the validity of their title deeds. But he was glad that his hon. friends the mover and seconder laid stress on the fact that there was no shadow of confiscation in their policy. They all desired to pay a fair price for what they wished to secure for the public well-being, and that, of course, must always be the bed-rock of any policy involving a scheme of expropriation. The last part of the Resolution said that in all cases of land acquisition the purchase price should be definitely based upon the value at which such land was assessed for purposes of taxation. He understood the mover had in contemplation not the existing system of local taxation but the assessment which would be set up under the Valuation Bill announced in the gracious Speech from the Throne. There could be no doubt that, as the law now stood, the value at which land was assessed for purposes of local taxation would not provide a fair purchase price. On the other hand, the present practice of assessing the value in cases of compulsory acquisition was most unfair in many cases to the local authorities. He remembered that the present Lord Advocate for Scotland, speaking in the House on the 27th of March, 1903, on the Land Values Assessment and Rating Bill, quoted two interesting cases from Edinburgh. He said—

> "There was a little block of land near the city forty-five acres in extent which the Water Trust sometime ago wanted for the purpose of forming filtering beds. Now the value of that land at thirty years purchase of the existing rent was £4,387, but when it was wanted for this public and necessary purpose the owner charged for it £20,000, or at the rate of 136 years purchase....There was another transaction, this time between the Town Council of Edinburgh and the Duke of Buccleuch. The city required land for the purpose of erecting new gas works in the neighbourhood of Granton but within the territory of the borough. The ground extended to 105 acres and it was partly built upon, but the average price at which it was rated was £5 10s 0d. per acre. At thirty years purchase the amount would be £165 per acre, or a total value for the ground of £17,300. How much had the City of Edinburgh to pay for that ground? No less than £124,000, or 212 years purchase of the rating value."

With facts like those before them they could not but say that the present practice of assessing the value in cases of compulsory acquisition was most unfair in cases to the local authorities. The new system of valuation in the promised Bill would, he hoped, provide them with a definite basis upon which to work. But he would go the length of saying that he did not think even then they could take that wholly and exclusively as the basis upon which that transfer should be made. As far as he could see, having got this new Valuation Bill, and the new valuation, their duty would then be to see that the assessment of land taxation should be a very material item indeed—not necessarily the sole item—in giving them the basis for determining the price of expropriation. In that sense, and on that understanding, he could adopt the general proposition put forward in the Resolution of his hon. friend.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY said that throughout the debate there had been a disposition entirely to ignore the extremely large contributions made of their own free will by owners of land for the benefit and advancement of the happiness of the dwellers on the properties with which they had to do, and the fact that many of the most valuable public properties in this country had been presented free by generous landlords. He thought it was a pity, when these subjects were talked about, that they should hear of the "tyranny of the landlord" in refusing to rebuild buildings, when no attempt was made to show that there could be any real right or claim upon him to do so. An hon. Member on the Labour Benches had spoken of the "huts in which the rural population was herded." The huts in which the agricultural labourers lived on the land which he was interested in cost him, as a landlord, some £250 a piece, and paid him in rent £2 10s. a year. It was said that it would be a beneficial thing if municipalities speculated in land. He had his doubts. He doubted whether it was economically sound or whether it was good for the ratepayers or the welfare of the population within the municipal districts where the speculation took place. The financial aspect of the question had been dealt with by his hon. friend the Member for the City of London. No attempt had been made on the other side of the House to reply to that economic and financial argument. He would venture to deal with the speech of the hon. Gentleman who represented the Government on this occasion. Of course one was interested in the line which he took, but one had not been able to help making a comment or two to oneself in the course of his remarks. The hon. Gentleman had held up to them Germany and France as examples of letting land around urban areas to semi-rural cultivators; but let him remind the hon. Gentleman that it was conceivably possible that any advantage which accrued to that semi-rural population might arise from the fact that rural industries there had a better chance, because they were carried on in countries in which a different fiscal system obtained from what we had in this country. Moreover, the urban authorities in Germany would probably not have ventured to make those investments in land had it not been for the fiscal arrangements under which they acted. No doubt in the legislation which the hon. Gentleman had shadowed forth he would be able to devise some arrangement which would make ownership of land more profitable than it could possibly be under present conditions. The hon. Gentleman had referred to a remark of Lord Ridley as to the ownership of land, and as to the large amount of land owned by Peers in this country; but the question did not depend on who owned the land, but on the use to which the land was put by those who were on it. If he was right in his contention, he believed that, broadly speaking, the owners of the land had used it well, wisely, generously, and farsightedly for the benefit of the whole of the community, and the fact that it was owned by one particular section did not come within the purview of this Resolution. The hon. Gentleman said he thought people only talked of confiscation when they were afraid of the validity of their title deeds: he could hardly have been serious in that. But the essence and pith of the Resolution was contained in the closing clause—

> "The purchase price should be definitely based upon the value at which such land is assessed for purposes of taxation."

He rather fancied that if those words were deleted, the Resolution would be of comparatively little value to the mover or to those who supported it; yet that was the absolutely logical result of the speech of the hon. Gentleman representing the Government. It was suggested that the value of the land should be fixed definitely according to its assessment for purposes of taxation. Let them assume that a certain portion of land was notoriously likely to be valuable in the immediate future, that that land formed part of an estate, and that on that estate there were certain family charges or certain mortgages; nobody would suggest that those charges or mortgages had any relation whatever to the assessed value of that land. Those charges had been placed on the land entirely with reference to the economic value, that was to say the price which the land would fetch if it were put up to public auction in the circumstances in which land was sold now. He did not suppose he was very far out when he said that land which might be let for £100 a year might be mortgaged for many thousands. But he only said that to fortify the position which the hon. Gentleman had taken up. It was quite clear, therefore, on the hon. Gentleman's own showing that the Resolution could not be supported except as an abstract proposition which was not intended to be pressed to any practical issue. In such cases as had been sketched by the mover and seconder, he thought that a good many of them would have great sympathy with those affected. They spoke of a circumvallation of the town caused by the absolute refusal of the owner to sell his land. If that were the true condition of things he would have a good deal of sympathy with those who complained of it. Did the hon. Member really think that there were in England many such instances as he had cited? He doubted it very much. He thought they were cases which were largely used for platform purposes, or to win cheers or votes. He did not think they existed in any number, if at all. If hon. Members were going to discuss the question in a spirit of justice and fair play, he would ask them to remember that the legitimate and rightful owners of the land had also some claim to consideration, and something more than consideration, as well as the municipal authorities who were to acquire the land. Supposing that the land had been perfectly legitimately acquired by the owner, who had been perhaps rather more far-sighted than his municipal neighbours, what was going to be done in such a case? As far as he could judge of the argument of the hon. Gentleman, it was that if the private owner had exercised foresight and wisdom in the purchase of land, he was not to be allowed to reap the benefit of his foresight and calculation. Not only would they deprive the owner of his harvest, due to his own foresight and enterprise, but they would put the municipality in a position to reap the full benefit of that harvest whenever it came. He could not speak of urban districts with any particular knowledge, but those who had the good fortune to live in the country and enjoy it were not likely to be backward in sympathising with their fellow-creatures who were placed in a less happy position, and there was much in the Resolution with which many on his side of the House agreed. If it was true that there was need to acquire land for public purposes, let them leave out "compulsorily," and say "by agreement." He knew that would not suit hon. Members opposite, for in the minds of some people it was not possible to do good to one class without doing harm to another. Reference had been made to the necessity of providing simple and inexpensive machinery for the acquisition of land. He might say that any reform of that kind would have the support of all landowners, but the closing part of the Resolution suggested what was practically absolute confiscation and spoliation, and, therefore, he would go into the lobby against it.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) moved to amend the Resolution by providing that the purchase price of land sought to be acquired should be "based upon a fair valuation." He believed that if his hon. friend would accept the Amendment his Motion would be agreed to unanimously by the House. They were all agreed that it was desirable that local authorities should be saved a great deal of the unnecessary expense they now had to incur when they wanted to acquire land for local purposes. He was afraid, however, that the mover of the Resolution had in his mind something very different, and there appeared to be behind the proposal an advocacy of the taxation of land values and the confiscation of what was called the unearned increment. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board had taken a somewhat curious line. He had explained that it was impossible for the Government to accept the last words of the Resolution as it stood, and he had ended by saying that according to his own interpretation of them they could accept them. The words of the Resolution as they stood were absolutely intolerable. The price to be paid for the land should be "definitely fixed upon the value at which such land is assessed for purposes of taxation." That was intolerable. A man bought a small holding near a town, paying a high price for it, upon the expectation the value would increase. Meanwhile, he used it as a market garden and was properly taxed for a market garden. The mover of the Resolution proposed to take away that man's land paying him only market-garden value and not the higher price he had paid for it. That was absolute confiscation, whether applied to a rich man or to a poor man. What power that would give to local authorities to be dishonest! They could raise their rates and lower the assessment, taking the land on their own valuation. They could thus confiscate any land they wished. Why should local authorities be credited always with the foresight to know when land was going to rise in value? As a matter of fact, nothing was more difficult than to foresee how land was going to rise in value. He would quote the very striking case of the school in which he was educated, a school founded in the reign of Edward VI. by a citizen of London, Sir Andrew Judd. In his will Sir Andrew left the school a large strip of land in the neighbourhood of Tonbridge. Subsequently he thought he had left the school too much, and he changed his will, took away from the school the piece of land near Tonbridge, which he then left to his relations, and left to the school instead a smaller piece of land in London on which St. Pancras Station now stood. He believed his hon. friend was a business man; if he and other business men believed that land was always going to rise in value, why did not they take money out of their business and buy land with it? The answer was that in practice there was no more certainty in land speculation than in any other speculation, and the chance of loss in land speculation was a very heavy one. He argued that self-assessment would be unworkable. His object in moving the Amendment was to remove from the Motion all traces of confiscation. Hon. Members who supported the Motion believed that, by giving larger power to the municipalities, they would improve the social condition of the country. To a large extent he agreed with them. But surely they should not base a public advantage on a private wrong.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) in seconding the Amendment said that to take land and base the purchase price upon the value at which such land was assessed for the purposes of taxation would be absolutely indefensible.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 6, to leave out from the word 'be' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'based upon a fair valuation.'"—(Mr. Harold Cox.)

Main Question again proposed.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) rose to continue the debate,

And, it being after Eleven of the Clock, and objection being taken to further proceeding, the debate stood adjourned.

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out from the word 'that,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the force of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for Home defence or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field.'"—(Mr. Wyndham)—instead thereof, resumed.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SUPPLY [8TH APRIL] REPORT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th April], "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Resolution, 'That a sum not exceeding £91,000, be granted to His Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1908, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens.'"

Question again proposed.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY [8TH APRIL] REPORT.

Order read, for Consideration of Ninth and Tenth Resolutions.

Resolutions agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden), in moving the Adjournment of the House, gave notice that the Prime Minister would to-morrow move the suspension of the Eleven o'clock rule.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington) thought it might be for the convenience of the House for him to say that, if that Resolution were carried, the sitting to-morrow was likely to be peculiarly long.

Adjourned at a Quarter after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Welsh Private Bill Legislation.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): To ask the Prime Minister whether he can now give the terms of the Amendment to the Standing Orders that he proposes to move with a view to meeting the request of Welsh Members that all the representatives of Welsh constituencies shall be placed on any Committee to which Bills relating exclusively to Wales and Monmouthshire may be remitted; and when the proposed Amendment will be placed upon the Notice Paper.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) There are already Amendments on the Paper with this object, and when they are reached the views of the Government will be stated.

Exchequer and Audit Department.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Comptroller and Auditor-General, the Assistant Comptroller, or any of their subordinate chiefs, have the right to question any of their subordinates regarding private communications on the administration of the Exchequer and Audit Department that may have passed between any of such subordinates and a Member of Parliament; whether the right exists to question any of such subordinates regarding his acquaintanceship with any Member of Parliament, and, if so, seeing that the whole staff of the Exchequer and Audit Department is composed of public servants paid out of public funds, will he explain under what authority or regulation such rights are claimed.

(Answered by Mr. Runicman.) In view of cases which have recently occurred in which information derived from official sources has been communicated without authority to the public Press and other persons, the Comptroller and Auditor-General has drawn the attention of his staff to the general rule in force throughout the Civil Service that such action will be considered a grave breach of duty, rendering the offender in extreme cases liable to dismissal.

Sugar Duties.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the sugar duties on fruit pulp at present operate protectively in favour of the British jam manufacturer; and whether it is his intention to bring this industry into line with the free trade policy of the present Government.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) No, Sir, nor, so far as I am aware, is there any foundation for the suggestion that such is their effect. Fruit pulp, other than pulp chargeable with the fruit duty, is liable to duty only in respect of the amount of sugar added.

Irish Land Purchase Loans.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether fresh borrowing for Irish land purchase is taking place at about the cost of £3 3s. 3d. per hundred pounds, which is more than the price at which Consols are being redeemed with the Sinking Fund; and whether he can see his way to changing this system.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The last issue of guaranteed $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. Stock was made at the price of eighty-nine, giving a yield of £3 1s. 9d. per cent. I am aware that this rate is higher than the yield of Consols at their present price, but I know no better way to improve the price of the Guaranteed Stock than by the application of Sinking Fund to the reduction of the National Debt.

Old Age Pensions.

CAPTAIN FABER: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in considering the subject of old-age pensions, he will consult the Secretary of State for War as to the advisability of commencing with those who have served for a certain period in His Majesty's Auxiliary Forces, and thus stimulate the desire to serve voluntarily in the Territorial Army.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) I do not think it would be practicable to adopt the hon. and gallant Member's suggestion.

Income Tax.

MR. BILLSON (Staffordshire, N.W.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can give an approximate estimate of the cost to the Revenue of separately assessing for abatement the several incomes of man and wife.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The Board of Inland Revenue have no materials for forming such an estimate.

Civil Pensions.

MR. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness, Burghs): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, seeing that the Treasury has no power as the law now stands to include Army or Navy service in the calculation of civil pensions, he will consider the question of the introduction of a measure to confer upon it such power.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The conditions of military and naval service are so different from those attaching to the Civil Service of the State that I think it would be undesirable to make the change suggested by my hon. friend.

Japanese Pharmacopœia.

MR. GODDARD CLARKE (Camberwell, Peckham): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that, in consequence of the publication of a new edition of the Japanese Pharmacopœia and the proposed enforcement of the standards of that work upon imports of chemicals and drugs into the Japanese Empire on and after 1st July, 1907, manufacturers and merchants of Great Britain are being put to trade inconvenience and loss, as the Pharmacopœia is only obtainable in the Japanese language, and no official translation of it in a European or classic language is available; and will he take steps to secure the postponement of the importation order until such period as the English translation of the Pharmacopœia has been published and the new standards are in consequence known to manufacturers and merchants in this country.

(Answered by Sir Edward Grey.) My attention has already been drawn to this matter and inquiries will be made at Tokio. Should the facts be as stated His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires will be instructed to ask the Japanese Government to allow an extension of time.

Recruitment of Native Labour in Portuguese East Africa.

Mr. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the proposed Anglo-Portuguese Commission for inquiring into the recruiting of natives in Portuguese East Africa has been abandoned; if so, whether he can state the reasons for its abandonment; and whether any other Commission will take its place.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Yes, Sir. The new Transvaal Government do not wish to proceed with it. They are appointing a Transvaal Commission to inquire into and report on the whole question of the recruitment of native labour in South Africa, and hope that a speedier settlement of the matter may be reached in this way.

Crown Agents' Contracts.

Mr. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Crown Agents for the Colonies issue any information as to the results of manufacturers' tenders, and as to the names of the successful tenderers, in cases where the contracts tendered for are placed by the Crown Agents.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Crown Agents for the Colonies follow the practice of Government Departments by treating tenders as strictly confidential.

Sir Alexander Swettenham.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state when the Papers connected with the resignation of Sir Alexander Swettenham will be in the hands of Members.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I cannot give a positive Answer, but Papers will probably be presented to the House in the course of next week.

Customs Assistant Clerks.

Mr. THORNTON (Clapham): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a petition from the new class of assistant clerks in the Statistical Department of the Customs has been received at the Treasury; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in the matter.

Customs Senior Assistant Clerks.

Mr. THORNTON: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that several of the senior assistant clerks have reached the maximum salary of their class, £150; and whether, having regard to the ages of the men concerned, he can hold out any prospect of an early improvement in their position.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) In the Customs Department there are twenty-six senior assistant clerks who have reached the maximum salary (£150) of their class. Their ages vary from forty to sixty-four years, the average age being forty-eight. Sixteen of the twenty-six are in receipt of an allowance of £30 per annum in addition to their maximum salary. I can hold out no prospect of acceleration of promotion for these men, if that is what the hon. Member has in his mind.

Mr. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury what was the average number of hours extra duty per man performed by assistant clerks in the Statistical Office of His Majesty's Customs during the year 1906; and how much of such extra duty was compulsory.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I am informed that the average number of hours of extra duty per man performed by assistant clerks in the Statistical Office of the Customs Department during the year 1906 was 374. During 182 of these hours attendance was compulsory owing to the necessity for the early publication of the Monthly Trade Returns. During 108 hours (included in the 374 mentioned above) attendance was given for the preparation of the Annual Statement of Trade. This attendance was to some extent compulsory, but the wishes of the clerks are met as far as possible. I understand that there is no difficulty in obtaining attendance.

Central Telegraph Office—Employment of Ex-Soldiers.

Mr. STEADMAN (Finsbury, Central): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that ex-soldiers have been given employment as telegraphists in the Central Telegraph Office, and have been paid commencing wages of 24s. per week, although being considerably over twenty-five years of age; whether he will state the salary that men, entering as learners and proceeding up the scale in the usual way, would receive at the same age as the ex-soldiers recently introduced; and whether he will state the reason for using the services of ex-soldiers to depress the standard of telegraphists' wages by employing them at a much smaller salary than the scale advertised by the Civil Service Commissioners when announcing open competitive examinations.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) As the hon. Gentleman is aware for many years past the Post Office has been bound to reserve a certain proportion of vacancies in certain grades of Post Office employment for ex-soldiers and ex-sailors, which has much restricted the openings for ex-telegraph messengers. Under a recent arrangement with the War Office, while the number of vacancies allotted to ex-soldiers and ex-sailors will in no way be increased, the Postmaster-General will have a freer hand in deciding what particular places shall be filled by them, thus enabling him to set free a larger number of vacancies to be filled by ex-telegraph messengers. As regards the ex-soldiers in question, the pay of 24s. given to them is merely probationary, and designed to support them while they are in the position of learners. The men are well aware that in due course they will, if they give complete satisfaction, be appointed to the establishment as telegraphists, and the point at which they enter the ordinary scale will then be fixed according to their experience and qualifications, and the value of their services. There is no question of placing them on a different scale from that in force for telegraphists in general.

Kilmarnock Court House.

Mr. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been drawn to the claim which has repeatedly been made through his department by the county council of Ayrshire against the Treasury for a grant under the Sheriff Court Houses Act in respect of alterations and improvements carried out at the Kilmarnock Court House; what is the reason for the prolonged delay; and when will a settlement be arrived at.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The Treasury have intimated a grant of £479 15s. 1d., but as there is still a small amount at issue, a final settlement has not been reached.

Post Office and Trustee Savings Banks.

Mr. REMNANT: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that for a number of years the total withdrawals have exceeded the deposits in the case of Post Office and Trustee Savings Banks; and if he can explain this fact.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The following Statements show, for the last ten years, the deposits and withdrawals in the case of the Post Office Savings Bank and the Trustee Savings Banks. As regards the Post Office Savings Bank, it will be seen that only in the years 1903 and 1904 have the withdrawals exceeded the deposits, while in the case of the Trustee Savings Banks there has been an excess of withdrawals in each of the last seven years. I am disposed to consider that the withdrawals may in great part be attributed to investments in Government stock, or other securities yielding a better rate of interest than 2½ per cent. for £100 cash. The position, however, is not so unfavourable as the hon. Member's Question seems to suggest, for, if the interest earned by the depositor be taken into account, both funds show a continuous increase over the period, except for the Trustee Savings Banks in the year 1904.

Bengal Opium.

Sir H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for India, what was the number of chests of Bengal opium remaining in store in India and available for export on the 31st March, 1907.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The number of chests of Bengal opium available for export which was in store on the 31st March last was 72,000 in round figures. The precise number is not yet available.

Snake Poisoning in India.

Sir W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for India what have been the total number of deaths and the death rates per million living from snake poisoning in India for each year for the last thirty years; and what measures, curative or preventive, are provided or encouraged by the Government of India with a view to reduce the mortality from snake venom.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The reported number of deaths and the death rate from snake bite in India during each of the last thirty years are as follows—

The Returns are probably not very accurate, as they are based on unskilled diagnosis. Rewards are offered in most provinces for the destruction of snakes, but experience has shown that this measure is not likely to have any appreciable effect on the mortality from snake bite, and the total amounts so paid are small. The medical officers employed at the research laboratories in India are engaged in investigating and testing the anti-venomous sera or other curative agents which have been suggested, and a system of treatment of affected persons by permanganate of potash, suggested by Sir Lauder Brunton, is being tried in some provinces.

Dublin Housing Difficulty.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the reply of Earl Carysfort's agent to the deputation from the Kingstown Urban District Council; whether he has received a copy of the resolutions passed at a public meeting held in Glasthule on the 7th April; and whether he can state what measures the Irish Government will take to preserve the people in their homes until better dwellings are provided.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have read a newspaper report of the proceedings of the Kingstown Urban District Council on 4th April, when the Chairman of the Public Health Committee stated the purport of the reply given by the Earl of Carysfort's agent to the deputation from the council which waited on him. I have also received the resolutions passed by the meeting at Glasthule. I explained to the hon. Member in my Answer to his Question on 22nd March that the Local Government Board have no power to intervene in the matter of the closing of these houses, which is one for the urban council to deal with so far as their powers enable them to do so. I gather from the newspaper report to which I have referred that there is reason to hope that steps will be taken to provide proper housing accommodation for the persons affected.

Higher Education in Ireland.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is his intention to introduce legislation this session in connection with higher education, as outlined by Mr. Bryce some time ago.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am not yet in a position to name a date for the introduction of the Bill on the subject of university education in Ireland.

Lord Kilmorey's County Down Estate

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what fixed price or percentage under the provisions of Section 23 (11) of the Land Act of 1903 has been arranged to be paid for negotiating the sale of Lord Kilmorey's estate, county Down.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have not yet fixed a negotiation fee in this case.

Irish Government Bill.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can name a date when he intends to introduce the Bill for the better government of Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I cannot yet name a date, but I hope it will be an early one.

Draperstown Sewerage.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the state of the main sewer in High Street, Draperstown, county Derry; whether he is aware that this sewer has been blocked for a number of years, that the sewage of the houses adjoining can find no outlets, and as a consequence the public health is seriously menaced; if he is aware that the local board of guardians last September tore up the road to ascertain what was wrong, but left it with five or six feet deep of sewage rising near the surface, and protected round with wooden bars; and if, in the interests of the public health, he will cause inquiries to be made into the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Local Government Board have ascertained from the Magherafelt Rural District Council that an obstruction exists in the main sewer at the back of the houses in New Row, Draperstown. A question has arisen as to whether the work of removing the obstruction should be carried out by the Council or the Drapers' Company, and this question was considered at a conference between a committee of the council and a committee of the Drapers' Company on the 6th instant. The result of the conference was to be considered at a meeting of the rural district council to-day.

Battery Sergeant-Majors and Quartermaster-Sergeants.

MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can now state how many battery sergeant-majors and battery quartermaster-sergeants will be affected by the Army Order, issued on the 11th March, which provides that continuance in the Service beyond twenty-one years of non-commissioned officers on the Home Establishment is to cease for the present.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Nine battery sergeant-majors and nine battery quartermaster-sergeants will be affected by the Army Order in question.

Limerick Barracks.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can make any report on the condition of the barracks, and particularly of the officers' quarters, at Limerick; whether he is aware that, when the 2nd Royal Munster Fusiliers arrived at Limerick a few weeks ago to occupy quarters vacated some six months previously by the 3rd Northumberland Fusiliers, they found them badly in need of repairs, littered with papers left behind by the latter regiment, showing that no proper cleansing of the barracks had taken place; whether in the officers' quarters the wall paper is peeling off the walls; if he will arrange to have the barracks generally put into a proper state of repair; and will he at the same time prevent any charges being made to the officers for that portion of the repairs carried out in the officers' quarters.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) A report has been called for.

Cost of the Army.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the average cost per man to the nation under the present system of the Infantry of the Line, Foot Guards, Cavalry, Household Cavalry, Horse Artillery, Field Artillery, Garrison Artillery, Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, taking each of the above arms separately, but including all ranks in each case; and what will be the corresponding figures, as far as it is possible to give them, under his new scheme.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane) For the purposes of this calculation the Regular peace establishments, exclusive of India, the normal numbers of the Army Reserve, and, for the new scheme, the Special Contingent and Special ervice section of the Territorial Army have been included. The average cost per head, all ranks, under the two systems is as follows:—

Sergeant-Major Henson, R.H.A.

Captain FABER: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that in the Army list for January, 1907, R. Henson is shown amongst the warrant officers of the Royal Horse Artillery, and in that of March amongst those in the Royal Field Artillery, the transfer of this man has been caused by misconduct; and if so, whether, seeing that his transfer imposes a disadvantage upon his juniors in the Royal Field Artillery by stopping promotion amongst them, he proposes to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Sergeant-major Henson was sergeant-major instructor at the riding establishment at Woolwich, and was reported by the commanding officer to be in some respects unequal to the important duties of his position. There was no vacancy in the Royal Horse Artillery in which he could be absorbed; he was consequently transferred to the Royal Field Artillery, This transfer in no way reflects on this warrant officer's character.

Superannuation.

Dr. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the authorised scales of superannuation, retired pay, or pension of officials and officers serving His Majesty in the Civil, Naval, and Military Departments and Forces of the Crown are based on the status or rank last held by the official or officer as well as on the amount of salary then paid to him; and whether, as a general rule, each grade receives a higher rate of pension than the grade below.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The rules for calculating retired pay and pension cannot be shortly stated. They will be found, as regards the Navy, in the King's Regulations; as regards the Army, in the Royal Warrant on pay and non-effective pay; as regards Civil Service, in the Superannuation Acts of 1834 and 1859.

Colonial Conference.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Prime Minister what Members of His Majesty's Government will be present at the Colonial Conference.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I cannot conveniently give a list, but, as already explained and in accordance with the practice on previous occasions, Ministers will attend the Conference when there is business affecting their Departments.

Small Holdings Bill.

Mr. BRODIE: To ask the Prime Minister whether he can state the date or approximately the date on which the Small Holdings Bill promised in the King's Speech for England and Wales will be introduced.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) No, Sir. I cannot give my hon. friend the information for which he asks at present.

Gibraltar Dockyard.

Mr. HARMOOD-BANNER (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what buildings have been omitted from the original scheme of the Gibraltar dockyard extension.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Edmund Robertson, Dundee): The buildings omitted are residences for principal and superior officers of the dockyard.

Greenwich Generating Station.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether a formal reply on the subject of the generating station at Greenwich has yet been received from the London County Council, in compliance with the request made to them last month.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Admiralty wrote to the Council on the 16th March, asking if they were in a position to give a definite reply. At present only a formal acknowledgment has been received, but further steps are being taken to hasten the Council's reply.

Sir John Fisher's Pay.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, in view of the Order in Council of 22nd February, 1870, providing that Admirals of the Fleet are to receive on retirement the half-pay of their rank, whether Sir John Fisher will receive on retirement the half-pay of an Admiral of the Fleet, or £1,222 15s. per annum, or the exceptional rate of half-pay of £2,000 per annum granted him under a secret Order in Council in 1906.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Under the authority of Order in Council of the 8th January, 1906, Sir John Fisher will receive retired pay at the rate of £2,000 a year.

Sea Lords' Salaries.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the total increase of salaries under all Votes for the four Sea Lords in this year's Navy Estimates over the amount paid in 1903–4; and why in the case of one Sea Lord the increase is made by an increase of half-pay mentioned in an appendix to the Navy Estimates, while in the case of the others it appears directly on Vote 12 for the Admiralty.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The total increase of emoluments under all Votes for the four Sea Lords in the Estimates of 1907–8 as compared with those for 1903–4 is £2,075 2s. 6d. The increase in the case of the First Sea Lord is partly due to the automatic increase of half-pay on his promotion to Admiral of the Fleet, and partly to the award of a special rate of half-pay in recognition of his distinguished services. It does not increase the emoluments of the post of First Sea Lord, and is not therefore provided for in Vote 12.

Engineer Officers' Shore Appointments.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many executive and engineer officers respectively are holding shore appointments, having served for more than five consecutive years in shore appointments; and whether these cases contravene the spirit of the Order in Council of 8th December, 1903, which was introduced to prevent the danger incurred in subsequently employing such officers in positions of responsibility afloat.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The numbers are three executive and eleven engineer officers. It is not likely that the majority of these officers will be required to go to sea again, and, in any case, the Order in Council, which does not apply to engineer officers, allows the Admiralty discretionary power in special cases.

H.M.S. "Blake" and "Blenheim."

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the "Blake" and "Blenheim" are being converted into mother-ships for destroyers, with only four six-inch guns left in each ship; and, if so, why they still appear in the Navy List as first-class cruisers.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The conversion named is not yet completed, and in the case of one vessel not yet commenced. The revision of classification will duly be considered.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the advisability of reconsidering the system of classification adopted under what is called the Dilke Return so as to bring it more in accordance with the actual facts?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Yes, Sir.

Territorial Force's Allowances.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what sum proportionate to the £75 to be allotted to each company of the territorial forces for contingencies and administration will be paid to the other units of the territorial force.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): Estimates for contingencies and administration of other units were as follows:—Cavalry Squadron, £150; Horse Artillery battery, £75; Army Service Corps Column, £150; Cavalry Field Ambulance, £75; Field Artillery Brigade, £600; Howitzer Brigade, £450; Heavy Battery, £150; Field Company, R.E., £150. It must be remembered that these figures are only approximate estimates based upon the present average expenditure of Volunteer Corps.

Mr. HARMOOD-BANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War upon whom will rest the responsibility of settling which half of the non-commissioned officers will not be entitled to receive separation allowances under the Territorial Forces scheme.

Mr. HALDANE: It was assumed, as a rough estimate, that about 50 per cent. of non-commissioned officers below the rank of serjeant would be married, and would consequently be eligible for separation allowance. These figures were calculated for the purpose of giving an approximate estimate of the total cost of the territorial Forces. Regulations will be subsequently issued regarding the issue of separation allowances under the Territorial Forces scheme.

Brigade Majors of Volunteers.

Mr. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the reports from the General Officers Commanding, to which he referred on 11th December, 1906,† in reply to a Question on the subject of the expenses falling on the brigade majors of Volunteer brigades, have been received; and whether he can now see his way to grant adequate allowances to these officers in view of their increased duties and expenses.

Mr. HALDANE: The reports have been received, and the whole question is being carefully considered.

Mr. CARLILE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how long the Question will be under consideration?

Mr. HALDANE: I cannot.

Royal Arsenal, Woolwich.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Stepney Division of Tower Hamlets, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any of the discharge notices recently issued in the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich, are due to the cancelling or suspending of work on orders already placed; and whether the reserve of vehicles for the Field Artillery is sufficient to place that arm upon a war footing at the present time.

Mr. HALDANE: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative. As regards the last part of the Question, the reserve of vehicles for the Field Artillery will be sufficient to place that arm upon a war footing when the orders have been completed.

Chicago Meat-Packing Establishments.

Mr. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will publish the Report by Lieutenant-Colonel Hobbes on the conditions which he found to obtain in the packing establishments of Chicago.

Mr. HALDANE: As I have explained to the House on a previous occasion, it is not intended to publish this Report.

China and Indian Opium.

Sir H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is in a position to lay upon the Table the proposals of the Government of China regarding the importation into that country of Indian opium, and the Report of the Government of India thereon.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Morley, Montrose Burghs): The matter is under my consideration, and I do not think that it would be for the public interest to lay any of the Papers on the Table at this stage.

Indian Budget.

Mr. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India when the Indian Budget is likely to be taken.

Mr. MORLEY: I hope I may be allowed to refer the hon. Member to the Answer that I gave him on the 18th March,‡ to which I am unable to add anything at present.

Church of Scotland Chaplains in India.

Mr. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Act of 3 and 4 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 102, stipulates that at each of the Presidencies two of the chaplains shall always be ministers of the Church of Scotland; whether there are eight Church of Scotland chaplains in Bengal, four in Bombay, and four in Madras; whether, seeing that the same section of the said Act gives to the Governor General the right to grant to any sect, persuasion, or community of Christians, not being of the United Church of England and Ireland, or of the Church of Scotland, such sums of money as may be expedient for the purpose of instruction or for the maintenance of places of worship, he can see his way to consider nominations from ministers and licentiates of Presbyterian churches, other than the Established Church of Scotland, for the chaplaincies other than the two reserved in each Presidency for ministers of the Church of Scotland.

MR. MORLEY: I am aware of the facts stated in the first two paragraphs of the Question. As to the third paragraph, the action at present taken under the provision of the law referred to in it is limited to the payment of the expenses of ministrations to troops by ministers belonging to denominations other than the two established churches. The clergy so subsidised are not on the Government establishment. I am advised that it is doubtful whether the terms of the statute admit of the appointment to the establishment of ministers not belonging to either of those two churches.

MR. GULLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that since the passage of the Act of 3 and 4 Will. 4 there has been a disruption in the Church of Scotland; that according to the law of the Established Church of Scotland the minister of any Presbyterian church can be admitted as a minister of the Established Church; that, on 27th March 1907, the Presbytery of Edinburgh, which has jurisdiction over the Presbyterian chaplains in India, refused, by 36 votes to 4, to adopt an overture limiting that law; that, on 1st April 1907, the Presbytery of Glasgow unanimously sustained a call from Townhead parish church to a minister of the United Free Church of Scotland; and whether, in view of these facts, he would be prepared to consider nominations for Presbyterian chaplaincies in India from ministers and licentiates of Presbyterian churches other than the Established Church of Scotland, without requiring them previously to join that Church.

MR. MORLEY: I have no information as to the recent occurrences referred to in the hon. Member's Question; but as regards the inquiry in the last paragraph, I have nothing to add to my Answer just given to his previous Question.

Bacteriological Institute in Mauritius.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state when it was decided to create a bacteriological institute in Mauritius; can he state the actual date on which the director was appointed; and whether the director is now resident in Mauritius, or is he in Europe.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The establishment of such an institute was first approved in 1904, and the agreement with Dr. Lafont, who has been appointed director, was signed on 28th September last. He is at present in Europe.

Mauritius Legislative Council.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a feeling exists amongst the majority of the inhabitants of Mauritius for an increase in the number of elected members sitting in the Legislative Council; has any communication on this subject been submitted to the Colonial Office during the last three years; and, if so, will the complete correspondence be issued as a Parliamentary Paper.

MR. CHURCHILL: The answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative. The only representation on the subject which has been received during the last three years is one from inhabitants of the district of Flaines Wilhems asking for an additional member for the district, which the Governor was unable to endorse. The Secretary of State does not propose to lay Papers.

Trinidad Local Customs Tariff.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is yet in a position to give the names of the Commission appointed by the Trinidad Government to revise the local customs tariff; whether a representative of the working class has been appointed a member of the Commission; whether evidence from the working class will be called; and whether the proceedings of the said Commission will be made public.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Committee to which the hon. Member refers consisted of the Collector of Customs of Trinidad, the Receiver General, two members of the Legislative Council, three merchants, and two agriculturists. No member of the wage-earning class was appointed on the Committee. Evidence from that class was received, and the Governor reports that their views are fully dealt with in the Committee's Report. It is not proposed that the proceedings of the Committee should be made public, but its Report will be published in due course.

Imprisonment of British Subjects in East Africa—Cases of Captain Grogan and Mr. Bowker.

MR. T. DAVIES (Fulham): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, if his attention has been drawn to the recent disturbances in British East Africa, which led to the imprisonment of Captain Grogan and Mr. Bowker, at Nairobi; whether he can say if the two gentlemen were placed in the same prison as the natives; and whether he can give any information as to the particular crime for which they were convicted.

MR. CARLILE: At the same time may I ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether Captain Grogan, Messrs. Bowker, Gray, and others have been committed to prison at Nairobi, British East Africa, for chastising natives alleged to have insulted white women; and, if so, whether these Englishmen are now incarcerated in a common prison at Nairobi with native felons; and whether the Colonial Secretary will give the necessary instructions for their immediate release.

MR. CHURCHILL: With regard to the second part of both Questions I do not know whether these men are confined at Nairobi or Mombasa. In neither case is there a special prison for Europeans, but, although Europeans and natives are imprisoned in the same building, they are, of course, kept in different parts of it. Provision has been made in this year's Estimates for the construction of a prison for Europeans at Nairobi. With regard to the remaining part of the Questions, I think it will be convenient if I read the written Answer which I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for Kingston. "According to the Secretary of State's present information, these men were charged with holding an unlawful meeting and resisting the police. The officer administering the Government reports that the insult was apparently not of a serious nature, and at most did not amount to more than rudeness and disobedience. He further reports that after collecting upwards of 100 Europeans, of whom many were armed, Captain Grogan and the persons acting with him flogged the three natives concerned in a most brutal manner, in front of the Courthouse at Nairobi, in spite of the attempted intervention of the magistrate and a police officer. The natives were not handed over to the police. As at present informed, the Secretary of State sees no reason for revising the sentence of the Magistrate's Court upon Captain Grogan, and he proposes to defer the question of laying Papers on the Table of the House until he has received full details by mail."

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) asked how it was that, if these Englishmen were guilty of the brutal assault the hon. Gentleman described, they were charged not with the assault, but with the somewhat technical offence of unlawful assembly; and whether it was the fact that the natives said to have been assaulted by Captain Grogan applied to Captain Grogan the same evening to be reinstated in his service.

MR. CHURCHILL said he had given the House the information which the Secretary of State had received officially from the officer of the Government of the East African Protectorate.

*MR. CAVE: The right hon. Gentleman has promised to lay Papers when the mail arrives. Will not the sentences have been practically served by that time? Will the hon. Gentleman lay the telegram he has received?

MR. CHURCHILL: I have given the House practically the substance of the operative telegram.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) asked whether the hon. Gentleman, in view of the state of the prison accommodation at Mombasa and Nairobi, would take steps to see that these men were not treated in the same way in prison as an Englishman was treated last year.

MR. CHURCHILL: Great improvements have been made in the accommodation of the gaols at Nairobi and Mombasa, and further improvements are in contemplation. No doubt everything will be done to make the conditions of the imprisonment of Europeans conditions which are not detrimental to their health and not derogatory to the proper standards of humanity. Of course the country is still in a very primitive condition of development, and persons who misconduct themselves in countries in that condition of development are liable to suffer.

MR. CARLILE asked whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that the prison at Nairobi consisted of a single courtyard, with buildings round it occupied in common by whites and blacks, and that in such a prison in the tropics it was impossible for the prisoners to remain within the buildings, and therefore whites and blacks were in joint occupation.

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

*CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): Are the warders who look after European prisoners, natives or Europeans?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

*MR. CAVE asked whether the hon. Gentleman had been informed that Captain Grogan's health was such that imprisonment of the character described might have very serious results.

MR. CHURCHILL: Information has been brought to my notice personally, and also to that of the Secretary of State to that effect. I have no means of testing that information, but a telegram has been sent to the officer administering the Government of the East African Protectorate to take careful note of the fact and investigate it, in order that no serious detriment may occur.

MR. CHURCHILL added that the whole question of imprisonment or release was in the discretion of the officer administering the Government, whom the Government were supporting in the action he had taken.

Judges in British East Africa.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the previous judicial experience, and what were the professional qualifications of the judges and magistrates now doing duty in British East Africa.

I beg further to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how many officials in the administration of British East Africa have had South African or other African or Colonial experience.

MR. CHURCHILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the list of officials given at page 48 to 73m of the "Handbook for East Africa, Uganda, and Zanzibar, 1907," which furnishes particulars regarding their Colonial experience. I am having a copy of the book in question sent to the hon. Member.

White Settlers in British East Africa.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any steps are being taken to promote white settlements on the upland districts of British East Africa; and whether it is the intention of the Administration to bring Indian settlers to these districts, which are suitable for European colonisation.

MR. CHURCHILL: No special steps are being taken to induce persons to leave this country in order to settle in the East Africa Protectorate; but the Government is incurring considerable expenditure on the Survey, Veterinary and Agricultural Departments, and in other ways, in order to assist those who have actually settled there. I am not by any means in a position to say that British Indian subjects will be altogether excluded from these districts.

SIR J. RANDLES (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Is there any probability of the Report referred to in the Question being speedily brought before the House?

MR. CHURCHILL: I did not refer to a Report. I said the Government were incurring considerable expenditure in developing these particular Departments.

Administration of British East Africa.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies when a legislative council is to be given to British East Africa; whether a white police are to be organised, and of what kind; and what precautions are being taken meanwhile to protect the lives and property of Europeans.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State cannot at present name a date for the establishment of the proposed legislative council. A small force of white police is being recruited locally, but rather in order to obviate the necessity for European offenders being arrested by the native police than with a view of protecting the lives and property of Europeans which are not believed to be in any danger, sufficient protection being afforded by the native police and the King's African Rifles.

New Hebrides Convention.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if a Commission to settle administrative details in connection with the New Hebrides Convention has been appointed; if so, can he state the place and date of meeting of the said Commission; and can he give any further information to the House on the subject.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): A small Anglo-French Committee is being appointed to settle the salaries and other conditions of service of the officials of the Joint Court established by the New Hebrides Convention. This Committee will probably meet in London, but the date of meeting has not yet been definitely fixed.

MR. ALDEN asked if he was to understand that the terms of the Commission did not extend outside, merely affecting salaries.

SIR EDWARD GREY said that was so.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Is there no intention to extend the scope of this Commission, in view of the promises made by the right hon. Gentleman that questions relating to the employment of natives outside the New Hebrides, and the regulations relating to them, should be submitted to a Commission of this sort?

SIR EDWARD GREY: This Committee is appointed for this special purpose. If larger questions are to be raised they will have to be considered with reference to something else.

New Hebrides Conference.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, who will represent this Country at the conference with the French Government on the New Hebrides Convention; and if representatives of Australia and New Zealand may be allowed to take official part in the proceedings.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The representative of His Majesty's Government on the Anglo-French Committee has not yet been selected. The Governments of Australia and New Zealand will probably appoint their own representatives on the Committee.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies when and where the Conference with the French Government to settle the by-laws of the New Hebrides Convention will meet.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I must refer the hon. Member to the reply returned to-day to the hon. Member for Tottenham.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: Have the Government any intention of altering the conditions of the Convention?

Sir EDWARD GREY: That matter cannot arise in connection with this Conference.

Sir GILBERT PARKER: Will the Australasian Government be invited to send delegates?

Sir EDWARD GREY: I have said they will probably appoint their own representatives.

Congo Free State Administration.

Mr. ALDEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that reports of great cruelty and oppression in the Congo Free State have been received from Mr. Jeffrey, of Ikan, and Mr. Ernest Cartwright, of Baronga; whether he can give the House any official information on these reports; and what action, if any, he proposes to take.

Sir EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Consul at Boma has sent home a letter received by him from Mr. Cartwright in regard to the incidents alluded to. They have already been brought to the knowledge of the Judge Substitute, and it would not appear that there is at this stage, at any rate, any further action to be taken as regards this particular case.

Sweden and Norway.

Mr. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any progress has yet been made in the negotiations between this country and other Powers with a view to the substitution of a new treaty for that of 1855 with reference to Sweden and Norway.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I can only refer the hon. Member to my reply of 26th February on this subject,[†] to which, at present, I have nothing to add. It would in any case be unusual to make statements about negotiations which concern several other Powers while they are incomplete.

Mr. ASHLEY: Can the right hon. Baronet say when the negotiations are likely to be finished?

Suppression of the Opium Traffic—Conference.

Mr. ALDEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has consented to be represented at the Conference called by the United States Government to consider the question of the suppression of the opium traffic; whether any other Powers have given their adherence to this proposal; and whether the House can be furnished with the terms of reference and the programme of the Conference.

Sir EDWARD GREY: As regards the first part of the Question, the United States Government have been informed that His Majesty's Government are willing, on certain conditions, stated in my reply of 20th March to the hon. Member for Rushcliffe,[‡] to take part in a joint international Conference or Commission of investigation. The replies of the other Powers consulted have not yet been communicated to His Majesty's Government, nor have any terms of reference or programme for the Conference or Commission yet been submitted.

Egyptian Secret Service Fund.

Mr. J. M. ROBERSTON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will state the amounts of money annually granted to Lord Cromer and Sir Reginald Wingate for secret service purposes in Egypt and the Soudan during the past five years.

Sir EDWARD GREY: Details of the distribution of secret service funds are never published. It clearly could not be done without destroying the use of the fund.

Egyptian Concessions Board.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Egyptian Government has appointed a Concessions Board, consisting of Mr. Mitchell Innes, Chitty Bey, and Rocca Serra; if so, will he say by whom they were nominated, for how long, how many sittings have they held, how many and what concessions have been submitted to and granted by them, and why no native sits on the board.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information on the subject, which falls within the competence of the Egyptian Government.

Egyptian Landholders—Penalties for Infraction of Rules.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the penalties inflicted on landowners in Egypt for infractions of rules take the form of withdrawal of irrigation water supply for a given number of days; whether he can state the number of cases in which such penalties were inflicted during the past year; and whether, seeing that such penalties are inexpedient, as having the effect of seriously checking agricultural production, he will instruct the British Agent at Cairo to advise the substitution of fines and other penalties of a less economically injurious character.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information on this subject; I do not consider it advisable to instruct the British Agent to interfere more than is necessary in matters of administrative detail.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us some idea of the lines of instruction beyond which he does not consider it necessary to go?

SIR EDWARD GREY: It would be exceedingly difficult to lay down a definition, but our general policy is to interfere as little as possible when you have good men in charge.

Newspapers in Egypt.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British Agency at Cairo grants any subvention to a Syrian journal entitled Al Mokattam, published in Arabic, a Coptic journal entitled Al Wartan, and a French journal entitled Les Progres, owned by a Greek, or any of them; and, if so, what amount is annually paid to each.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I cannot answer this Question. It is one on which, if I had any information, I should have to decline to give it.

British Consular Service in Egypt.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that in the British Consular Service in China and Japan promotion depends largely upon proficiency in the native language; whether three years study is prescribed, with at least three examinations; and whether he will take steps to secure that in Egypt, where the British civil servants are so largely engaged in administrative duties, a similar standard of proficiency in the native language shall be established for them.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Promotion in the British Consular Service in China and Japan no doubt depends greatly on proficiency in the native language. I have no reason to believe that this is not also the case in the Egyptian Civil Service, but Englishmen in the service of the Khedive are subject to regulations laid down by the Egyptian Government, and not by that of His Majesty. It is, however, the case that the native language is one of the qualifications for entry into the Egyptian Service.

Egyptian Milk Supply.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there are in Egypt any penal or other regulations intended to insure a pure milk supply for human consumption or to prevent the adulteration of alimentary substances and liquids; and, if so, what was the number of prosecutions, convictions, and repeated convictions, and the penalties or other, and what, punishment imposed or inflicted in respect of breach of such regulations during the last five years.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information on the subject; but I would point out that a serious obstacle to effective regulations of the nature described exists in the régime of the Capitulations.

Cattle Disease in Egypt.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that, according to the Report for 1905 of the Egyptian Government inspector, Monsieur Piot Bey, the precautions taken against the importation of diseased cattle into Upper and Lower Egypt are insufficient; and whether proper measures of prevention have been taken or are in contemplation.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have not seen the Report in question; the only information I have recently received on the subject of cattle plague in Egypt is contained in Section 83 of Lord Cromer's Report for 1906.

Prison Warders' Grievances.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has recently received a number of petitions from the warders and assistant warders of His Majesty's prisons, both metropolitan and provincial; whether these petitions show a state of unrest and dissatisfaction both as to wages and conditions of service on the part of prison officers; and whether he will consider the advisability of appointing a small Committee to inquire into these alleged grievances, or whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Petitions were received last year from all local prisons asking for an improvement in the scale of pay. After a careful examination of the matter I was able, with the consent of my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on the advice of the Prison Commissioners, to grant considerable improvements by increasing the maximum salary of the different warder ranks, by giving larger annual increments of pay to the warders and principal warders, and by raising the lodging allowance at provincial prisons where proof was forthcoming that the authorised rate, owing to the prevalence of high rents in certain places, entailed pecuniary loss on officers for whom it was not possible to provide quarters. There was nothing in the petitions to justify their being described as showing a state of unrest and dissatisfaction, and I see no occasion for any further inquiry. A full account of the increases in pay, etc., was given in my printed Answer to a Question put by my hon. friend the Member for Rochester on 15th November last. †

The Prerogative of Mercy.

MR. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any settled principles govern the exercise of the prerogative of mercy in cases involving the capital sentence; and, if not, whether he will consider the desirability of taking steps to establish such principles.

MR. GLADSTONE: It would be neither desirable nor possible to lay down hard and fast rules as to the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy. Numerous considerations—the motive, the degree of premeditation or deliberation, the amount of provocation, the state of mind of the prisoner, his physical condition, his character and antecedents, the recommendation or absence of recommendation from the jury, and many others—have to be taken into account in every case; and the decision depends on full review of a complex combination of circumstances, and often on the careful balancing of conflicting considerations. As Sir William Harcourt said in this House, "The exercise of the prerogative of mercy does not depend on principles of strict law or justice, still less does it depend on sentiment in any way. It is a question of policy and judgment in each case, and in my opinion a capital execution which in its circumstances creates horror and compassion for the culprit rather than a sense of indignation at his crime is a great evil." There are, it is true, important principles which I and my advisers have constantly to bear in mind; but an attempt to reduce these principles to formulæ and to exclude all considerations which are incapable of being formulated in precise terms would not, I believe, aid any Home Secretary in the consideration of the difficult questions which he has to decide.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to suspend capital punishment until a Court of Criminal Appeal has been established.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir.

† See (4) Debates, clxv., 84.

Deportation of British Subjects.

Mr. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many British subjects have been sentenced to deportation under the Aliens Act; whether any were actually deported; and what steps, if any, were taken by the police authorities to ascertain the prisoner's place of birth.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The Aliens Act does not provide for the expulsion from the United Kingdom of British subjects and none have been expelled. In four cases evidence has been forthcoming, after expulsion was recommended by the Court, that the prisoner was a British subject, and in these cases I have, of course, refrained from making expulsion orders. The onus of establishing his British nationality rests with the prisoner.

Inspection of Underground Bakehouses.

Mr. WILKIE (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the officers of the Factory Department have taken any samples of the air in underground bakehouses after long spells of work in these places; and whether assistant inspectors are forbidden to enter bakehouses where machinery is used.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Air samples are taken at the discretion of the inspectors, and no special instructions have been given as regards underground bakehouses. I am unable to say without further inquiry to what extent samples of air in these bakehouses have been taken by the inspectors, but I may perhaps remind the hon. Member that special provision with regard to the ventilation of underground bakehouses is made by the Factory Act, Section 101 of which prohibits the use of any underground bakehouse unless it has been certified by the district council to be suitable for the purpose as regards construction, light, ventilation, and in all other respects. As regards the last part of the Question, I would refer the hon. Member to the Answer given by me, on the 18th February, † with regard to the new scheme of duties for factory inspectors' assistants in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for Leicester.

Electric Tramcar Fatalities.

Mr. BELL (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that seven accidents, due to brake failures and resulting in loss of lives, have occurred on corporation and other electric tramways within the last eighteen months; and whether, in view of the development of electric traction, he will appoint a Committee to inquire into the best system of brake-power which should be adopted, with a view to its compulsory adoption, in the same manner as on railways, in order to prevent such recurrences.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Lloyd-George, Carnavon Boroughs): I am aware that there have been several fatal accidents in the period mentioned due to tramcars running away or leaving the rails, and that in some cases the brake mechanism was in fault. The whole question of tramway braking appliances is at present being investigated by Committees appointed by the Tramways and Light Railways Association and the Municipal Tramways Association respectively, and the Board of Trade have expressed their willingness to assist in a joint inquiry at a later stage.

Limited Liability Companies.

Mr. VIVIAN (Birkenhead): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the number of limited liability companies registered in the year 1906, and the amount of their nominal share capital.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: The number of limited liability companies registered in the year 1906 in the United Kingdom was 4,840 and the amount of their nominal share capital was £136,738,249.

Newton Heath Railway Accident.

Mr. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to an accident at Newton Heath, Manchester, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, on 25th March, in which several passengers were injured; and, if so, whether an inquiry has been ordered; and whether such inquiry will include questions as to how long the fireman had been in the service of the company, and how many days he had been employed on passengers or other trains.

† See (4) Debates, clxix., 551.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: This accident was duly reported by the railway company and an inquiry into the circumstances attending it will be held by an inspecting officers of railways.

Hamburg Dock Strike.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the number of labourers who have left this country for Hamburg during the past four weeks, and the number who have returned to this country during the same period.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have been unable to obtain this information.

MR. FELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to get it shortly?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think it can be obtained at all. We have no means of ascertaining it.

MR. FELL: But has not the Board of Trade particulars of those who leave the country?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: We have statistics, but nothing to show why the labourers have gone over there.

Scales of Discarded War Stores in London.

MR. ALDEN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, according to the report of the medical officer of health for the City of London, tinned foods, consisting of left-over war stores from South Africa, are being continually put upon the market at low prices and sold to the poor of East and South London; that some of it has been dealt with as trade refuse by one of the borough councils; and whether, in view of these facts, he will cause special inquiry to be made with regard to the distribution and sale of these doubtful stores.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I understand that the medical officer of health for the City has made a report on this subject, and I have asked for a copy of it. I believe, however, that the facts are generally as stated in the Question. I have for some months past endeavoured to ascertain all the available facts as to the importation and distribution of the foods referred to, and as far as practicable to prevent their reaching the public when they have been unsound or dangerous. As I have, however, stated on previous occasions further legislation of the kind contemplated by the Public Health (Regulations as to Food) Bill now before the House is necessary to enable a matter of this kind to be dealt with effectively.

Erith Relief Works.

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Board has reconsidered its decision with regard to the scheme for relief works submitted by the Erith Distress Committee, the carrying out of which the urban council expressed its willingness to support; and can he now state whether arrangements have been made to grant assistance.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have received from the distress committee a letter, dated 5th April, asking me to reconsider my decision in this matter. It did not appear to me that this letter showed any sufficient ground for an alteration in the decision referred to; but, even if it had, it was impossible for me to comply with the request for a payment out of the grant, as no payment could be made out of it after 31st March, when the financial year ended for the service of which it was voted.

Glamorganshire Education Estimates.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in the estimates made by the Glamorganshire County Council for the year ending 31st March, 1908, the amount estimated to be received in respect of Government grants for voluntary schools is £19,000, and the amount estimated to be spent in the maintenance of the same schools is also £19,000; and whether, seeing that no part of the salary of teachers in voluntary schools is estimated to fall upon the rates in that county, he will except the voluntary schools in it from the provisions of the Education (Special Religious Instruction) Bill.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): I do not consider that the financial estimates of the Glamorganshire County Council, framed before the Education (Special Religious Instruction) Bill is passed, afford any ground for anticipating by an amendment the state of affairs which will exist when that Bill becomes law. I should in any case be unable to adopt a course the effect of which would be to maintain the existing statutory obligation upon the local education authority to defray the cost of giving special religious instruction in voluntary schools.

* LORD R. CECIL: Will the effect of the Bill be to remove the statutory obligation to defray the cost of religious instruction?

MR. McKENNA: The effect will be to throw on the managers the cost of giving special religious instruction.

Royston Schoolmaster.

*MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that Mr. O. Milnes was appointed as headmaster of the Royston National school by the casting vote of the chairman of the managers, the Reverend R. J. Thorpe; that the local education authority refused to consent to the appointment solely on educational grounds; that of the sixty-two applications there were at least five among the applicants who were more suitable than Mr. Milnes for that particular post; that the Sharlston elementary school is not comparable in point of average attendance and responsibility to the Royston National school; and whether, seeing that it is an all-sufficient reason for a local education authority to withhold their consent to an appointment on educational grounds, His Majesty's inspector, Mr. Marvin, did not exceed his duty in furthering the interests of one teacher to the disadvantage of other teachers in the West Riding who are better qualified on educational grounds.

MR. McKENNA: I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave yesterday† except that I am unable to agree with my hon. friend that His Majesty's inspector exceeded his duty in stating his opinion, when asked, that Mr. Milnes was not educationally unfit for the position of head master of the Royston school.

His Majesty's School Inspectors.

*MR. CLOUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to lay down a general rule that His Majesty's inspectors should take up an impartial attitude between different members of the teaching profession; and in cases of dispute between denominational boards of managers and the local education authority?

MR. McKENNA: Yes, Sir.

Monmouthshire Education Committee.

LORD R. CECIL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in view of the fact that the Monmouthshire Education Committee recently passed a resolution that the salaries of teachers who had completed their apprenticeship should be raised to £25, and subsequently stated that the resolution applied only to teachers in council schools, he proposes to take any action to remedy this treatment of teachers in voluntary schools.

MR. McKENNA: The settlement of the salaries of teachers rests with the local education authority and so long as the local education authority fulfil their statutory duty to maintain and keep efficient the public elementary schools in their area, I see no reason to interfere.

Butter Adulteration.

*MR. NUTTALL (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been drawn to the conviction of certain butter merchants at Bath on the 20th March, who were fined £50 and costs for selling butter alleged to contain 16·4 per cent. of water, whilst the analysis made at the Government laboratory showed only 15·82 per cent. of water, or 0·18 per cent. less than the presumptive limit of the Board of Agriculture; whether he is aware that the Government analyst stated that the difference between his own percentages and those of the prosecution might be largely accounted for, if not entirely, by the process of evaporation; and whether, seeing that the Government analyst corroborated the analysis of the prosecution by a statement founded on mere surmise, when his own analysis showed that the legal limit had not been exceeded, he proposes to take any action in the matter.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.): The Answer to the first two parts of my hon. friend's Question is in the affirmative. With regard to the third part, I may say that notice of appeal against the decision of the magistrates has been given, but that in any case the Board have no authority to interfere.

Greenock Prison Governorship.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the store warder in Dundee prison has recently been promoted to be governor of Greenock prison; if so, will he say whether due consideration was given to the qualifications of other warders of equal merit and longer service; and on what grounds the Dundee warder was singled out for exceptional promotion over the heads of other meritorious warders senior to him in the service.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The promotion as stated by my hon. friend has been made. After due consideration had been given to the qualifications of other warders, both as to merit and length of service, this officer was selected.

MR. WATT: Was this appointment made on the initiative of the Prisons Board or on that of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. SINCLAIR: It was made on my responsibility after consultation with the Prisons Board.

Training of Scottish Teachers.

MR. GULLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, before the programme of work for senior students drawn up by the provincial committees for the training of teachers is put in operation, he, as Vice-President of the Scottish Education Department, will satisfy himself that, while due provision is made for professional studies, nothing is done to interfere with the progress of the students in their general education.

MR. SINCLAIR: The proposals of the provincial committees for a programme of work for their senior students require the approval of the Department under Article 18 of the Regulations for the Preliminary Education and Training of Teachers, and, as the Minister responsible for the decisions of the Department, I will see that the proposals sanctioned make due provision for the general education of the students as distinct from their professional training.

River Annan Fishery.

MR. GULLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the case tried in Dumfries Sheriff Court on 20th March, when Thomas Murray, of Moffat, was fined 10s., with 30s. of expenses, for fishing for salmon in the River Annan, though there was abundant evidence that the streams around Moffat had been regularly fished both for salmon and trout for many years without permission and without challenge; and whether the Government will take into consideration the circumstances of all the rivers in the south of Scotland as well as in the case of the Tweed.

MR. SINCLAIR: My attention has not been drawn to this matter otherwise than by my hon. friend's Question. I am not in a position to express any opinion as to the evidence laid before the Court on which the decision was founded. The general question, as I have previously stated, is under consideration.

Driver Gourlay's Sentence.

MR. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the circumstances under which Driver

Gourlay was sentenced at Edinburgh, on 12th March, to five months imprisonment; and, in view of Gourlay's age and exceptionally good character, whether he can now remit the remaining portion of the sentence.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The most anxious consideration has been given to this matter, and after making full allowance for the exceptional circumstances of the case I did not feel myself justified in recommending a greater remission than two months. The Answer, therefore, to the Question is in the negative.

Irish University Education Bill.

Mr. C. B. HARMSWORTH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in a position to give an approximate date for the introduction of the proposed Bill dealing with University education in Ireland.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): I am not yet in a position to name an approximate date for the introduction of the proposed Bill dealing with University education in Ireland.

Cusack Estate Cottage Loan.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he will state when the loan to Robert Armstrong to build a cottage on the lands of Mornin, on the Cusack estate, recently allotted to him, will be made.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have not yet acquired possession of the property in question, and until they do so they cannot issue the free grant which they propose to make for building purposes in the case of Robert Armstrong.

Cusack Estate Evicted Tenant.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that pressure is being brought upon the Estates Commissioners by Mr. George Henry Miller, a member of the Land Commission staff, to leave Mr. Alexander Frayne in possession of the holding on the Cusack estate which the Commissioners have decided to restore to Mr. Swifte, the evicted tenant; and, if so, will he request the Commissioners to adhere to their former ruling.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have made an offer to the Land Judge for the purchase of the estate in question, including the holding now occupied by Mr. Frayne. If the Commissioners should acquire this holding they propose to sell portion of it to Mr. Swifte, evicted tenant. The Commissioners inform me that there is no foundation for the suggestion that Mr. Miller has brought any pressure to bear on them in the matter.

"Grabbing" at Lanesborough.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in 1900 the village of Lanesborough was purchased under the Small Dwellings Acquisition Acts and all the householders, except Terence Farrell, became proprietors of their own homes; whether he is aware that this man's holding has now been grabbed by a sapper working in county Cavan, named Connor, whose action has created the utmost indignation in the locality; and whether he will instruct the Local Government Board to place at the disposal of the Longford district council the money originally advanced, but subsequently withdrawn, for the purchase of Farrell's holding, and thus prevent a breach of the peace in this district.

Mr. BIRRELL: In October 1901 the Local Government Board sanctioned a loan of £1,222 to the Longford Rural District Council in order to enable them to make loans for the purchase of certain houses under the Small Dwellings Acquisition Act. This amount included provision for an advance to Terence Farrell of £84, being four-fifths of the value of his house, Farrell himself being liable for the balance of the purchase money. The loan was approved by the Treasury, but the district council borrowed only £1,100 of the amount, and it would seem from the Question that Farrell's application was withdrawn. The Local Government Board have no information that Farrell's holding has been acquired by Connor. It rests with the district council to determine whether an advance should be made for the purchase of Farrell's holding, as the Board's sanction of the full loan of £1,222 still holds good, assuming that the purchase can be legally proceeded with.

Irish Linen Damask.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tidvil): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he has taken or contemplates to compel the manufacturers of damask to have the words "Irish hand-woven linen damask" woven into the fabric of all such goods produced in Ireland.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am not aware that the Board of Trade have any power to compel manufacturers of damask to mark their goods in the manner suggested.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE: My suggestion is that they should secure such powers in continuation of existing powers which enable them to compel the name to be written in ink.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am not sure whether that point could be considered by the Committee on Trade which is now considering the Merchandise Marks Bill.

Mr. LIDDELL (Down, W.): Is it not a fact that damask manufacturers in Ireland are quite prepared to adopt the marking suggested in the Question, and that in some cases they have already done so, but that in many cases the firms they do business with object?

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I should like notice of that Question.

Blocking Motions.

Mr. ARTHUR HENDERSON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of recent instances of Members successful in the ballot for private Members' Motions having had their right rendered abortive by Members introducing Bills on similar subjects, the Government will take steps during the discussion of the Procedure Rules to render such action impossible.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper:—

Mr. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in continuation of his Motion upon the Order Paper in reference to the Standing Orders of the House, he can see his way to propose a new Standing Order which shall protect an hon. Member who has secured priority by ballot from being deprived of his opportunity of bringing on a Motion in the House by the introduction of a Bill on a similar subject by some other hon. Member.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): To ask the Prime Minister when the Government will introduce the Standing Order, indicated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to put a stop to the practice of setting down blocking Motions and blocking Bills.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the Questions standing in the name of my hon. friend the Member for the Appleby Division and the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone at the same time. We shall be very glad if a remedy can be found for the present practice, which is open to serious objection. My right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the last day before the House adjourned for the Easter recess stated on behalf of the Government that we would consider the matter with the view to concerted action on the part of all sections of the House. This particular question does not come within the scope of the scheme of changes in the Rules of Procedure now under consideration, but it can be dealt with as soon as we have made sure that it can be freed from controversy, and that the acceptance of a proposal on the subject by the House would not involve any loss of time.

Lord R. CECIL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any steps have been taken to see whether such an arrangement is possible?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not during the Easter recess.

Lord R. CECIL: Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been called to the fact that the Easter recess has come to an end for some days?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There is sometimes a little margin allowed.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the unanimous declaration of this House, just before the Easter recess, that the practice referred to is hurtful to the usefulness of the House and an infringement of the rights of Members, does not, in the opinion of the Government, bind the action of Members.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I wish it did. But the Resolution certainly furnishes grounds for hope that such a desirable result may be attained.

Royal Bounty Fund.

MR. CARLILE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that a grant of £75 was made in the year 1897 from the Royal Bounty and Special Service Fund to Mr. Thomas Hardman, formerly clerk of the Clerkenwell County Court, after twenty years service, during which he was allowed one year and three months leave of absence, he can see his way to make a similar grant in the case of Mr. Charles George Hunt, of Danesbury, Warwick Road, New Barnet, who served in the same capacity at the same court for nearly sixty years, during which period he was only allowed nine months leave of absence, and who is now in failing health and in impoverished circumstances.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Payments from the fund referred to are made solely at my discretion. The case of Mr. Hunt has been decided on its merits; and I must abide by the decision, at which I have without hesitation arrived, that it is not a proper case for a grant of Royal Bounty. I understand that Mr. Hardman's case was a peculiar one as his eyesight had failed from an exceptional strain incurred in the execution of his duties.

MR. CARLILE: Is there any continuity in the principle under which these grants are made? If so, on what ground was a grant refused in this case? Was not Mr. Hunt with his sixty years service as fully entitled to a grant as Mr. Hardman with twenty years service?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The grants are made purely as a matter of grace, and each case is dealt with on its own merits. I have no personal knowledge of or responsibility for the decision in Mr. Hardman's case, but in the case of Mr. Hunt I am satisfied there is no reason for a grant from this fund.

MR. CARLILE: Was not there greater merit arising from the fact that Mr. Hunt had sixty years service?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps I may be allowed to say I do not think there is anything less likely to be beneficial, than that my discretion in applying this fund should be made the subject of discussion on the floor of this House.

Scottish Privy Council on Education.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education in Scotland are responsible for their proceedings to this House; and when and where their proceedings are conducted.

SIR H. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: The Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education in Scotland are represented by the Secretary for Scotland who is Vice-President of that Committee and responsible to this House for Scottish Education. It would be contrary to precedent and practice to give particulars as to meetings of any Committee of the Privy Council.

MR. SMEATON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that the names of the Members present at the preparation of the minutes shall be attached to them.

*MR. MORTON: Has this Privy Council ever held a meeting?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have been, in more Governments than one, a Member of this Committee, but my memory does not carry me back so far as a meeting.

*Mr. MORTON: I will put another Question on the matter.

Negligent Parents.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether His Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of passing a Bill giving power to school authorities to prosecute parents who have failed, by their own default, to provide sufficient food for their children.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The advisability of extending the existing powers of prosecuting parents for neglecting their children was very fully considered and discussed by the Select Committee on the Education (Provision of Meals) Bill of last session. That Committee, after taking evidence on the question, decided that the existing powers arising under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, Sections 3, 21, and 23, the Vagrancy Act of 1824, Sections 3 and 4, and to a certain extent under the Poor Law Act of 1899, and the Industrial Schools Act of 1866, are sufficient without giving the additional powers suggested in the Question.

Irish Bills.

Mr. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister on what date it is proposed to introduce the Bill intended to provide for the establishment of an Irish Council.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot yet name a day for the introduction of either of the Bills in which the hon. Member is interested. I think my Answer covers his subsequent Question.

To ask the Prime Minister on what date it is proposed to introduce the Bill intended to deal with the question of University education in Ireland.]

The Colonial Conference.

Mr. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the Resolution unanimously passed at the annual meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, held in London on the 6th March, stating that the issue of the Colonial Conference will largely determine the nature of the future relations between the Mother Country and the Colonies, and therefere praying His Majesty's Government to afford a warm welcome to the Colonial representatives and so to conduct the negotiations that reciprocal trading within the Empire may be promoted and that the ties of sentiment may be supplemented by the equally strong ties of self-interest furnished by reciprocal trading; and what effect he can see his way to give to the Resolution.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe the terms of the Resolution are as stated. A cordial welcome will of course be given by His Majesty's Government to the Representatives of the Colonies whom we have invited to come to London. It seems hardly necessary for this body of gentlemen who constitute the Associated Chambers of Commerce to pray for such a reception. The subject of Preferential Trade, as the hon. Member is aware, occupies a prominent place on the list of the subjects for discussion.

Mr. EVELYN CECIL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to take any steps in regard to the Resolution passed by the London Chamber of Commerce on Wednesday, by a majority of two to one, in favour of a change in our fiscal policy.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not see how that question arises out of my Answer.

Small Landholders (Scotland) Bill.

Mr. ANNAN BRYCE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister when the Second Reading of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Bill is likely to be taken.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As soon as possible.

Answers to Questions.

Mr. ANNAN BRYCE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the inconvenience resulting from the fact that the official record of Answers to oral Questions is not available until after the lapse of eight days, he will consider the question of amending the Standing Orders to the effect that Answers to oral Questions shall appear in the Votes and Proceedings of the ensuing day.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am disposed to think that the grievance in question is not very great. If a Member is absent from the House when Answers are given, he can generally see a report of what has passed in one or other of the papers the following day. My hon. friend will see that the printing of some eighty Questions and Answers would entail some expense; and, to make the Report complete, the Supplementary Questions and Answers would also have to be included. And that is a consideration which raises the larger and more difficult question, which has often been the subject of inquiry by Committees of this House, namely whether there should be an official record of what is said in the House as well as of what is done in it.

MR. ANNAN BRYCE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that very often it is difficult, owing to the noise in the House, to hear the Answers to Questions which really are important, and that when they are neither heard nor reported, one has to wait eight days before he can ascertain the Answer. Would not time be saved by printing the Answers as suggested?

Land Valuation Bills.

MR. FINDLAY (Lanarkshire, N.E.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the statement in the King's Speech that it is the intention of the Government to introduce this session Bills for the valuation of land in Scotland and also in England and Wales, he can say when these Bills are likely to be introduced.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid that I am not in a position to make a statement at present.

Hexham Election.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the returning officer in the recent election in the Hexham Division postponed the election for nearly a week after the date desired by the representatives of both parties, and that excessive excitement and some disturbance developed during that period of delay; whether he will consider the introduction of legislation for shortening the period between the issue of the writ and the election day, and for the limitation of the discretion of the returning officer, especially in the case of county elections.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the reason given by the High Sheriff for the postponement was his determination to attend the Grand National, which he understood was a horse race.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that the polling day was delayed at the recent election in the Hexham Division. The delay may have been undesirable and have led to unfortunate consequences, but we must presume that there were strong reasons for it, based upon public duty. I believe that returning officers are usually quite willing to fix the date of polling so as to meet the general convenience of all parties in the constituency, and that it would be undesirable to limit further the period elapsing before the election, as such limitations might work unfairly.

Charity Commission Vote.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Vote for the Charity Commissioners has not been discussed in this House since 1902, but guillotined with other Votes, amounting in the aggregate to several millions; and whether he can promise that during the present session an opportunity will be afforded the House for discussing the Vote for the Charity Commissioners, and, if possible, for discussing all other Votes, in order that the practice which during the last ten years has grown up, of voting millions of money without a word of explanation or any information upon the subject being afforded to the House, shall be terminated.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Government are entirely in the hands of the House in this matter; and if a general desire is expressed for a discussion of this Vote we shall be glad to put it down on one of the allotted days.

The Committee of Defence.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether a visit was paid to British stations in the Mediterranean during 1906 by or on behalf of members of the Committee of Defence; if so, whether those who paid such visit set out with any definite instructions; whether he can give any information as to those instructions, if any; what was the expenditure incurred in connection with the visit; and upon what Estimates presented to Parliament has such expenditure been charged.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the negative. A Committee was appointed by the Secretary of State for War with three representatives appointed by the Admiralty to visit the Mediterranean stations and to report whether any revision of the armaments was necessary to bring them into harmony with certain principles laid down by the Admiralty and approved by the Committee of Imperial Defence. It must be evident that instructions thus arising cannot be made public. As H.M.S. "Terrible" was proceeding to the East with relief crews, and as her captain was a member of the Committee, the Admiralty allowed the other members to proceed on board this ship.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if the military authorities gave evidence before the Committee?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN asked for notice.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: Was any definite authority given to the Committee to increase or decrease the expenditure on defence?

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District): I greatly regret to have to trouble the House with a personal explanation, but certain circumstances have arisen which constrain me to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. An hon. Member of this House has seen fit to go into my constituency and to make allegations against myself amounting to this: That the votes which I have given in support of the Government from time to time are not votes which have been freely and conscientiously given, but are votes which, in effect, the Government have purchased by monetary payment to me through the Liberal Party. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil, speaking in Wrexham, in my constituency, on 24th March, said—

> "Clement Edwards is paid by Liberal money. Clement Edwards and I have been friends for twenty years; but remember, if the Liberals are going to pay your member they are going to claim his vote in the House of Commons."

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that I should not have found it necessary to trouble the House, but that I should have been able by means of correspondence with the hon. Member to have got a withdrawal of the statement. I wrote to him on 28th March, as follows:—

> "From the local papers I see you are reported as saying in your speech last Sunday in my constituency that Clement Edwards is paid by Liberal money. I need not say that this statement that I am paid by the Liberal Party is entirely false, and I must ask you to withdraw it. You and I may differ, as we do, in political methods, but this difference does not justify you in abusing your Parliamentary position by going into my constituency and deliberately circulating statements of a personal character which you must know to be untrue.
> "Awaiting your reply, yours truly,
> "CLEMENT EDWARDS."

> "Dear Edwards,
> "The terms of your letter are such as almost to preclude reply. I have not seen the paper from which you purport to quote, nor do I recognise in the alleged quotation anything said by me at Wrexham on Sunday last.
> "Yours faithfully.
> "KEIR HARDIE."

On the following day I sent the following letter:—

> "My dear Hardie,
> "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 29th, and have taken the trouble to procure the report of your speech in three local papers which I enclose. You will see that you are reported in all of them as having said that 'Clement Edwards is paid by Liberal money.' This, as I said before, is entirely untrue, and I must ask you to withdraw the statement without qualification so that the withdrawal may have the same publicity as the original statement.

"CLEMENT EDWARDS."

The newspaper cuttings I sent were from the North Wales Guardian—a Conservative paper—and the Wrexham Advertiser, a Liberal Paper.

I waited for a week and did not get a reply. Thereupon, on 8th April, I wrote to the hon. Member as follows:—

"Dear Keir Hardie,

"In default of a letter from you withdrawing your untrue statement at Wrexham that I am paid by Liberal money, I have had consultation with the Speaker on the matter. With his sanction I propose raising the question in the House on Thursday afternoon, unless in the meantime I get a withdrawal of the statement from you. If you are not able to be in your place on Thursday afternoon I shall be glad of a note from you saying which day you will be.

"Yours truly,
"CLEMENT EDWARDS."

"Dear Edwards,

"On my return to London last evening I found your letter dated 2nd April and also your further communication of 8th April.

"I have again to repeat that I do not recognise in the Press cuttings anything that I said at Wrexham.

"I hope to be in my place on Thursday when the House meets.

"Yours very truly,
"J. KEIR HARDIE."

To this I answered on the same day:—

"Dear Hardie,

"I have yours of this date. You repeat that you do not recognise in the Press cuttings anything that you said at Wrexham. This is neither conclusive nor satisfactory.

"The passage in question could not have been invented by all the newspapers. Perhaps you will kindly tell me in what respects the Press reports are inaccurate, and what you really did say,

"Yours truly,
"CLEMENT EDWARDS."

The hon. Member's reply, dated 9th April, was as follows:—

"Dear Edwards,

"Had the question with which yours of yesterday's date concludes been put in either your first or second communication, I should have answered it.

"Since, however, you have seen fit to give the Press notice of your intention to raise the matter in the House, I shall wait until I have heard your statement before making any reply, and make it in such form as to ensure equal publicity with your statement.

"Yours truly,
"J. KEIR HARDIE."

I only desire to add that there is not one single word of truth in these allegations. It is perfectly true that, in common, I believe, with the poorer Members of every Party in this House, I received a small portion of my election expenses, I myself, out of my own pocket, finding the great bulk. No pledge, however, was asked of me, and no pledge was given. The statement that I have been paid by Liberal money, and that in consequence I have been required to vote in a certain way in this House, is absolutely and entirely untrue. I leave it to the hon. Member for Merthyr either to substantiate the statement or to withdraw it.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): I made no such statement. I was not referring to the hon. Member. I was addressing a meeting in what I subsequently learnt to be his constituency. I was conducting an argument to show that the Labour Party, since it paid its own Members by funds subscribed by trade unionists, was an independent Party. I pointed out that, because the working people of North Wales had trusted the Liberal and Conservative Parties, not one Labour Member had been returned from North Wales. That is the point at which the hon. Member takes up my statement, and tells half the truth concerning it. At this stage someone in the meeting shouted "Clement Edwards," and his supporters cheered. Others derided the statement, and in the midst of the noise I replied, "Clement Edwards has his election expenses paid by the Liberal Party." Someone said, "No, no," and I repeated, "paid by the Liberal Party," and proceeded with my argument, that if a Party paid its Members it expected their votes. I do not suppose the Liberal Party would pay Members to vote against it [AN HON. MEMBER: It is a quibble.] The point I want to make is that, but for the interruption, the hon. Member's name would never have been introduced. It was the pure interjection of his name by one of his own supporters that led to the matter being mentioned at all. I repeat what I said in my letter, that if he had not blazoned abroad that he was going to raise this question to-day, if he had not assumed that the report in the Press was correct, he would have had a correct report, as I have now given it to him; but he preferred to assume the report was correct, and proceeded to demand a withdrawal and a public apology.

Mr. CLEMENT EDWARDS: I did not ask for a public apology.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE: I shall read the letter.

Mr. CLEMENT EDWARDS: Do so.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE (reading the letter)—

> "This was entirely untrue, and I am asking you to withdraw the statement without qualification so that the withdrawal may have the same publicity as the original untrue statement."

An HON. MEMBER: Where is the demand for an apology?

Mr. KEIR HARDIE: The apology was demanded in the first letter. [Cries of "Read it"!]

Mr. KEIR HARDIE: I regret the time of the House has been wasted over this matter. If I had cared to bring every case of this kind before the House in which I have been charged by hon. Members and the Press tipsters of the Party opposite with being in the pay of the Tory Party, supported by Tory gold, this House would never have been free of such complaints. I repeat that what I said was that the hon. Member had his election expenses paid, and I went on to add that I had no personal feeling against the hon. Member. I was not referring to him, but it was a general statement of principles. I said, and I repeat, that a Party which pays a Member or pays the expenses of a Member expects that Member to vote for the Party in the House of Commons.

Mr. CLEMENT EDWARDS: Do I understand that the hon. Member——

*Mr. SPEAKER: I think the incident should close now.

Lord R. CECIL asked whether the statement made by the hon. Member at Wrexham was not a breach of the privileges of the House.

*Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think there was any breach.

Lord R. CECIL: I meant the original statement made at Wrexham.

*Mr. SPEAKER: No, I did consider the matter from that point of view, and I came to the conclusion that it did not amount to a breach of privilege.

The subject then dropped.

RESIGNATION OF LORD CROMER.

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir Edward Grey, Northumberland, Berwick): I have to ask the leave of the House to read an announcement which I make with the deepest regret. Lord Cromer has, under medical advice, decided that it is necessary for him to resign for reasons of health; and I think it is best that I should read to the House the announcement in his own words—

> "I have arrived at the conclusion that I must ask you to accept my resignation. I have done so after very full consideration and consultation with my medical adviser and Sir Stephen Mackenzie, who is here. I am most anxious that it should be particularly understood that the reasons which have induced me to take this step are wholly due to the state of my health, and that no political considerations of any kind whatever are in any way connected with it. More especially I desire to say that nothing could be more effective or generous than the manner in which the present Government has supported me. It has been the greatest pleasure to me to serve under you, and it is with extreme regret that I shall break my official connection with you. After spending, however, forty-nine years in the public service, I am thoroughly worn out, and I am really unable to support any longer the excessive strain which my work entails. I feel also that I do not possess the health and strength which are necessary to do justice to all the very important interests involved. Both doctors are quite agreed that it is necessary that I should give up my work."

The news has caused the greatest regret to us, and will do so to the House. To me personally it means more than I can express. We have relied upon and placed our confidence in Lord Cromer, as successive British Governments have done for so many years. Some further correspondence has passed in the hope that Lord Cromer's decision might not be final; but, in view of the fact that the recovery of his health (of which, I am glad to think, there is the prospect) depends absolutely upon his retirement, we have been obliged to accept his decision. There will be other opportunities for dwelling more at length upon his work in Egypt; but I should like to say at once that it is the object of His Majesty's Government to maintain that work and to continue the policy which has been inspired by him, and of which a most admirable exposition is contained in his last Report just presented to Parliament. I do not underrate the difficulty of continuing without him the work which has been so dependent upon him. His retirement from Egypt is the greatest personal loss which the public service of this country could suffer. In the early years of the British occupation, in view of all the difficulties in Egypt and elsewhere, the success achieved by him would have seemed incredible, but for the fact that he accomplished it. And if in later years progress has been facilitated by the prestige and confidence which have attached to the occupation, it is by Lord Cromer himself that the prestige and confidence have been created. The King has approved the appointment of Sir Eldon Gorst to the vacancy at Cairo—an appointment which has been made after consultation with Lord Cromer. Sir Eldon Gorst has special knowledge of Egypt; there is no one who has possessed to a greater degree Lord Cromer's confidence or has been more closely associated with him personally in his work, and I am confident that this choice is the one best calculated to maintain and continue it.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): With your permission, Sir, and with the permission of the House, perhaps it would not be inappropriate that I should say one word in respect to the statement just made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The regret which he has expressed will be felt in an unqualified degree, I believe, by every man of every Party in the House and in the country. It is only history which can give an adequate estimate of the work Lord Cromer has done in Egypt; but we know enough and can survey with sufficient accuracy the magnitude of his work to feel how marvellous are the moral and material labours which he has gone through and to admire the manner in which, under international and other difficulties which might well have wearied out the patience of any less resolute administrator, he has carried through the great task committed to him. This is, perhaps, not the occasion, nor is it my province, to comment on the appointment of the successor His Majesty has named, in conformity with the advice of his responsible Ministers; but all who know Sir Eldon Gorst know how great are the abilities he possesses and how unequalled is his knowledge of recent Egyptian development, and, above all, how anxious he will be to carry out intact the policy which has been so marvellously accomplished by his great predecessor, whose loss to the public service we all lament. We wish him every success.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR asked as to the business for next week.

Sir H CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that, as a provisional arrangement, it was proposed to take Navy Supply on Monday—Votes 10, 2, 13, 14, 15, and other Votes, but not Votes 8, 9, and 12. On Tuesday the debate on the Second Reading of the Army Bill would be finished, according to what he understood to be an agreement. On Wednesday the Second Reading of the Patents Bill and the Butter Bill would probably be taken, and on Thursday the Budget. This arrangement was made on the supposition that the discussion on the Rules of Procedure would be concluded that night. If that could not be done—he did not wish to be unreasonable—the arrangement for Monday would be altered, and, if it was understood that the discussion of the Procedure Rules would be ended on Monday night, he would take that instead of Navy Supply. Two days for that discussion should surely satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite.

Mr. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.), in reference to the course of business, inquired whether, as two modifications had been placed on the Paper with regard to the new Rules of Procedure, one of which had reference to Standing Committees, the Prime Minister would endeavour to make arrangements that the discussion with regard to the Scottish Grand Committee should not take place in the small hours of the morning.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, the following Fifteen Members in respect of the Irish Tobacco Bill: Mr. Runciman, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland, Mr. Gordon, Colonel M'Calmont, Mr. Victor Cavendish, Mr. William Redmond, Mr. Mooney, Mr. Nolan, Mr. Boland, Mr. Gwynn, Mr. Vincent Kennedy, Mr. Dolan, Mr. Hazleton, and Mr. Reddy.

Report to lie upon the Table.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Mr. Lonsdale be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts.

Ordered, That Mr. Bowles be added to the Committee.—(Mr. Whiteley.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [20th March] as amended :—" (1) When a Bill has been read a second time it shall stand committed to one of the Standing Committees, unless the House, on Motion to be decided without Amendment or debate, otherwise order, and such a Motion shall not require notice, must be made immediately after the Bill is read a second time, may be made by any Member, and may, though opposed, be dedecided after the expiration of the time for opposed business. But this Order shall not apply to—(a) Bills for imposing taxes, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills ; or (b) Bills for confirming Provisional Orders. (2) The House may, on Motion made by the Member in charge of a Bill commit the Bill to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions, and to a Committee of the Whole House in respect of other provisions. If such a Motion is opposed the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes and from the Member who opposes the Motion, shall without further Debate put the Question thereon."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Question again proposed.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) moved as an Amendment to insert "or Bills involving any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund or out of money to be provided by the Public Revenue, or involving any charge upon the people." The rule proposed by the Prime Minister, he said, contained the general proposition to send upstairs to Grand Committees as many Bills as possible, with the exception of Bills imposing taxes, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills. By the present procedure such a Bill was read a first time when there was practically no opportunity for discussion. On the Second Reading it was not strictly in order, as he gathered from reading the Standing Orders, to discuss in detail the charge to be placed upon public funds or upon the people, the charge appearing in blank or in italics in the Bill. According to the present practice, that portion of the Bill was reserved exclusively for consideration in Committee of the Whole House, which had the right, he might say the ancient privilege, of dealing with the method of raising the money. When the Bill came up on Report, he found it laid down by May that it was distinctly irregular, and not permitted in the House on the Report stage, to discuss the method of providing the money. Occasionally a Member was able to get in some observation on some of these points on Report ; but, strictly speaking, criticism of the details of the ways and means of imposing the tax was the exclusive privilege of the Committee of the Whole House. Another point was that these matters were barred from consideration by the other House. Not only from the point of view of the other House but from the point of view of the House of Commons, Committee of the Whole House was the only place where this particular kind of subject could be fully discussed and dealt with. The effect of the rule, as proposed by the Prime Minister, was, as he gathered, that a considerable number of Bills which came within this category would be sent upstairs for the Committee stage to be dealt with in all the privacy and absence of discussion by Members of the House which the proposal involved. That was a point which was sought to be remedied by his Amendment. He desired to make clear by it that every kind of measure which involved any charge whatever upon the people should be taken in Committee of the Whole House. It might be replied that the Government by their proposal meant the same thing as he described by his Amendment. The words he had taken from Standing Order No. 71, which, he thought, contained the most reliable description of the kind of Bill which ought to be so considered. Standing Order 71 said :—" If any Motion be made in the House for any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, or for any charge upon the people," and so on, " shall be referred to Committee of the Whole House." They had there the exact words of what was not to be sent up to a Committee, but following the present and ancient practice of this House should be reserved for consideration in Committee of the Whole House.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Sir HENRY FOWLER, (Wolverhampton, E.): But that will remain as it is.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said if that was the case surely it would lead to confusion to have in the new Standing Order one description and to have a totally different description in Standing Order No. 71. The simplest course would be to accept his Amendment. But the Prime Minister had said that he absolutely declined to accept any of these Amendments. He wished for a moment to refer to the constitution of the proposed Committee to which the kind of Bill to which he referred would necessarily be referred. If every hon. Member had a right to sit upon the Grand Committee there would not be so much objection to the Standing Order as it was now proposed, but they had to be selected in a certain manner, and a large number of hon. Members would not have the right to sit upon the Grand Committee. All hon. Members who did not happen to be on a given Grand Committee dealing with a particular Bill a part of which involved a charge upon the people would be precluded from discussing in detail that portion of the Bill. That was a very serious matter, involving, as it did, a great constitutional change. He would like to remind hon. Members that the present Government might only be temporary. They all admired the high character of the present Government. A great man had said with great truth that—

> "Governments as a rule were standing conspiracies to rob and bamboozle."

That was a quotation from Richard Cobden. They recognised in the Prime Minister and his colleagues lofty intelligence, the most honourable conduct, and marvellous honesty, but it was conceivable that in two or three years somebody very different might occupy their places. Only two years ago there sat on the Treasury Bench a Government which did not possess the galaxy of talent and virtue of the present Government, and two years hence there might be a Labour Government in power with one of the hon. Members below the Gangway as Prime Minister. Governments changed, and sometimes changed for the worse, and the Party opposite in adopting new procedure rules were apt to forget that they were not the only persons who might take advantage of the facilities afforded. If this rule were not amended it would give a power which might impose burdens upon the people without the right of complete detailed discussion in that House. It would place that power in the hands not only of the present Government but of any future Government. The right of adequate criticism by the people's representatives of matters involving financial burdens was being taken away by the Prime Minister. One of the cardinal principles of the British Constitution was that the elected representatives of the people had the right to criticise freely and to object to any suggested new burden, but these new rules, if amended, would deprive them of that right. There was a suggestion that in the procedure rules now under consideration it was intended to pack these Committees, and that the Government were going to take very good care that they would be a large preponderance of their own supporters. Such a Committee, packed by a majority of the Government's own servile supporters, might be presided over by an hon. Member who would not occupy the lofty and independent position of Mr. Speaker, nor even that of the Chairman of Ways and Means, who was so conspicuous for his ability, his judgment, and his fairness. Therefore the Committee, to which a Bill to impose a burden on the people might be sent, might be presided over by a mere Party flunkey. [Cries of " Order."]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think the hon. and learned Member is permitting himself too much licence in saying that about the future Chairman of a Committee.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said he was only contemplating such a thing at some future day. He quite understood that the Chairman of such a Committee would not occupy the position of Mr. Speaker or of the Chairman of Ways and Means, who did not take any part in the political struggles and votes of the day. It was not proposed to extend that independence to the Chairmen of Grand Committees, and therefore he thought they would not be in such an independent and lofty position. To deprive hon. Members of the right to criticise and discuss in detail the imposition of a financial burden was an intolerable proposition. That was the effect of the proposal of the Prime Minister. On page 558 of Sir Erskine May's book there occurred the words "the Commons have for centuries faithfully maintained," and so on, referring to the rights and privileges of the Members of the House of Commons. After having been maintained faithfully for centuries, it was now proposed to abolish those rights and privileges. The Government were proposing to hand over the control and power of the House to a Committee upstairs. He would not labour this point further by entering into anything like a historical survey of the position, but he would like to state that the historian Green had pointed out that

> "the principle of all taxation granted by and all burdens imposed upon the people of this realm rested upon their voluntary consent given through their freely elected representatives."

From Henry III. down to the Tudors, towns which did not send representatives to Parliament could not be taxed, and it was a breach of that privilege which he was endeavouring to explain to the House, because a large number of members would be precluded from participating in the discussion of proposals dealing with fresh financial burdens. No taxation and no financial burdens ought to be imposed without an opportunity for full, complete, and unrestricted discussion in Parliament by the whole of the accredited representatives of all those who were going to be called upon to pay those taxes or bear those burdens. The Standing Orders which at present related to this matter were the oldest Standing Orders of the House. The Amendment was not a Party Amendment at all. It was simply a protest on behalf of the liberty, independence, and privileges of every Member of the House. He was afraid it was no use appealing to the Members of the Government to accept the Amendment, but he appealed for support to every Member of the House who was capable of being reached by argument or in any other way. He begged to move.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) seconded the Amendment. He concurred with the mover that if it were left to the judgment and the reason of the House the Amendment would be carried. It was a most important, and not in any way a Party Amendment. It was most unfortunate that such an Amendment should be considered in so small a House. The right to deal with questions of Supply had been a right of the representatives of the people since, as his hon. friend had said, the days of Magna Charta. All the disputes between the Crown and the House, in the days of Charles I., and also in preceding and succeeding times, arose on financial questions. The disputes were over the claim of the House to have the controlling power in matters of Supply. It had been understood that after what was in fact a Resolution the House obtained the power which it now possessed. It was never contemplated that it would of its own free will give up that power and put it into the hands of any Government, however wise they might be at any particular moment. It was not a question whether any given Government was capable or trustworthy. They were now deciding, probably for many years to come, a most momentous question. Private Members were asked to part with a right which they had won after many struggles, prolonged over a great number of years—to part with it to a certain number of men who happened by fortuitous circumstances to be the Government of the day. On questions of imposing or regulating taxes, or appropriating any part of the money raised by taxes, every private Member had as much right to be present and to record his vote as any right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had stated in reply to an interruption of his hon. friend, that the Order provided for money Resolutions being considered in the House. He did not see how the right hon. Gentleman was going to justify that proposition. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman would say that a Bill containing money clauses would have those clauses in italics, and that one part of the Bill would be referred to a Grand Committee, while the clauses in italics would be referred to Committee of the Whole House. But they must not take it for granted that because the present Government were prepared to do that, their successors would be prepared to do the same thing. They must see that the rules were so drawn that there would be no possible chance of a Government in the future avoiding the carrying out of the present intention of the right hon. Gentleman. The intention ought to be stated in the new Standing Order even if he was unable to accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the West Derby Division. Though the Amendment would be a considerable advance on the Standing Order, it would not in his opinion meet the case at all. Supposing the Standing Order was amended and the clauses in italics must be considered by Committee of the Whole House, the only question that could arise would be as to taking the money out of the Consolidated Fund. The question whether it was advisable to do that or not could not arise. A majority of the Members of the House would not be able, when a Bill was in Committee upstairs, to express an opinion on it though it was in respect of the Bill that the money was to be obtained. That seemed to him to be an extremely important point, and he hoped the Government would not lose sight of it. Supposing the Standing Order was passed in the form in which it was introduced, and a Bill which did not impose a tax but took money from the Consolidated Fund—and it was practically the same thing—was sent upstairs to be dealt with by a Grand Committee consisting of sixty to eighty Members, how was that Committee to be chosen? He had been reading the debates which took place in 1882, when the Grand Committees were instituted. It was pointed out by, he thought, Lord Randolph Churchill, that the manner of choosing the Members of the Committees was open to considerable objection. It was pointed out that the Committees were chosen practically by the Whips of the Parties. The Members put on the Committee by the Whips would be chosen because the Whips knew that they were not likely to give any great trouble.

Sir J. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): No.

Sir F. BANBURY said he understood why the right hon. Gentleman said "no." It was because the Members were nominated by the Committee of Selection. Of course the right hon. Gentleman paid no attention to the Patronage Secretary when he said that a certain Member should be on a Committee.

Sir J. BRUNNER: He never does it. It is done by the Committee of Selection, who represent the several Parties in the House.

Sir F. BANBURY pointed out that the Members of the Selection Committee were chosen by the Whips.

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): They are chosen by the House. I am a Member of the Committee of Selection, and I am there in opposition to the Whips.

Sir F. BANBURY said the hon. Gentleman might be the exception to the rule. It might have been impossible to keep him off the Committee. It was perfectly well known that the Members of the Committee of Selection were appointed with the approval of the Whips. That could not be denied. It was quite possible that the members of the Committee of Selection representing their Party might, from a Party interest, put on men on whom they could rely. [Ministerial cries of "Order."]

Mr. SPEAKER said that the hon. Member was anticipating discussion on the Amendment to Standing Order 48.

Sir F. BANBURY said when a Bill dealing with a money question or taking money out of the Consolidated Fund came before a Standing Committee no declaration was made by the members of the Committee, as in the case of private Bills, that they were not interested in it.

If a Bill went to a large Grand Committee, say of sixty Members, those Members would be chosen before it was known what Bills would be brought before them; and what was to prevent, quite by accident, of course, a large number of the Members being interested themselves or through their constituents in those Bills? That would apply especially to the Scottish Grand Committee. The money would have to be found by Members who were not on the Committee, and when the Bill came downstairs the opportunity of discussing the financial details would be gone. He thought that was a very important consideration, especially for English Members, for it must not be forgotten that they and their constituents paid the great bulk of the taxes and rates of the country, and, so far as he could see, the English Members would stand a very poor chance of exercising any control over those Bills if this Rule were passed. His hon. friend had observed that this Standing Order, unless amended, would place the whole power of Parliament in the hands of the Government of the day. He was rather inclined to agree with his hon. friend. It seemed an extraordinary result of the last general election that the Liberal Party, after all their declarations about the late Government having muzzled the House of Commons and taken the power out of the hands of private Members, should now come down and propose to take away from private Members this most important asset and privilege, which they had enjoyed from time immemorial. He sincerely hoped that the Government would reconsider their position. He begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 9, after the word 'Bills,' to insert the words 'or Bills involving any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund or out of money to be provided by Parliament, or involving any charge upon the people.'"—(Mr. William Rutherford).

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said that they had heard from the mover and seconder of the Amendment some interesting references to the constitutional rights of the people of this country and their representatives in regard to taxation. If there was a shadow of a shade of reality in what the two hon. Gentlemen had said in reference to any possibility, on the part of the Government, of interfering with what they regarded as the most sacred principle of the Constitution, viz., the supremacy of the House of Commons over all the expenditure of public money, he would as strongly protest against it as they did. If the House would allow him he would explain the procedure. There was what was called a Money Bill, which imposed taxation for the use of the State. Such a Bill could only be introduced in Committee of the Whole House. No Money Bill could be introduced by a private Member; and the Government of the day could only bring in such a Bill in Committee of the Whole House with the previous sanction of the Crown. The late Prime Minister had candidly confessed that his opinion in regard to Money Bills did not coincide with that of Lord St. Aldwyn and the late Sir William Harcourt. There was another class of Bills which were not Money Bills.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) asked if the right hon. Gentleman before he went further would tell the House what he proposed to do with a Money Bill in its later course? His hon. friend had been dealing with what would happen on the Committee stage.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said that what the hon. Gentleman had argued was that the House was being deprived by this new Procedure Rule of some power which it now possessed over Money Bills. That was not so. The next kind of Bill was one which contained a money clause, and such a clause was always printed in italics to show that it would have to be referred to and discussed in Committee of the Whole House. There were, therefore, two protections in regard to Money Bills. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer asked what they were going to do with those Bills at a future stage. The answer was that those Bills were outside the scope of the proposed new Standing Order. That Order would not apply to Bills for imposing taxes, or taking money out of the Consolidated Fund, or to Appropriation Bills. Let him read what the law said—

> "If the main object of a Bill is to impose a charge upon the public revenues of the United Kingdom or of India, or upon the people, or to appropriate any money so charged, or to release or compound a sum of money due to the Crown, its introduction must be preceded and authorised by a Resolution of a Committee of the Whole House. This Resolution must be recommended by the Crown, and must be agreed to by the House before the Bill is introduced."

There were no words in the English language which could be clearer than those.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said that they did not touch a Bill which contained a money clause.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said he was dealing with the introduction of Money Bills. They could not be introduced unless they had been sanctioned by a Resolution passed by a Committee of the Whole House, and previously recommended by the Crown. The words of the Amendment of the hon. Member had absolutely no meaning, and the House had been occupied for a whole hour in discussing a fiction.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said that with all respect he really thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had mistaken the argument of his hon. friend the Member for the West Derby division of Liverpool, and that he had also entirely mistaken the effect of the proposed new Standing Order. The right hon. Gentleman had dwelt upon the precautions which had come down among other ancient traditions that any Bill which imposed charges on the public funds should be introduced in Committee of the Whole House. He had stated in evidence before the Committee upstairs that that was no protection but a mere embarrassment in these days. That, however, had nothing to do with the contention of his two hon. friends. Passing from the first stage of the Bill to the Second Reading, on that point he had nothing to say, as it would be unaffected by this proposal. Then he came to the third stage, which was the Committee, and as to that he really thought the right hon. Gentleman had left the House in a very dangerous condition of doubt. They all agreed that a Bill that imposed taxes, such as a Budget Bill, was one which could not go upstairs, but he would ask whether a Bill that was not one for imposing taxes, but which incidentally imposed taxes whether that would go upstairs.

SIR HENRY FOWLER said that such a Bill would go to a Committee of the Whole House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that if that was the view of the right hon. Gentleman he must alter Sub-section (a) of the Standing Order and except Bills involving charges, and he was sure after the explicit statement which he had made on behalf of the Government he would be content to accept such an Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman had said that every Bill involving a charge must, in the nature of the case, in the Committee stage be discussed in the Whole House. If that was the view of the Government he admitted that they had gone a long way to meet their views, but they had not embodied that view in the Standing Order. He would, by way of illustration, take two concrete cases which would make it perfectly clear. The Army Bill which was now before the House had a clause which did impose a charge, and that clause could only be inserted after leave had been obtained in Committee of the Whole House; but as they read this original Resolution they were under the impression, in spite of that, that it would be in the power of the Government to send it upstairs, until the right hon. Gentleman assured them that that was not so. He saw on the front bench opposite one right hon. Gentleman nodding assent and another negativing the suggestion, while the Prime Minister had so far maintained a discreet immobility. At all events, it was quite clear to anyone who heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy that, in his opinion, neither the Army Bill of this year nor the Education

Bill of last could have been sent to a Committee upstairs. But was that the meaning of the Standing Order? If they had not passed the words he would like to move a slight verbal alteration which would make it quite clear that no Bill in which there was a clause involving a charge should go upstairs, and he thought that would meet the views of the mover and the seconder of the Amendment. He thought the Government would see with the Chancellor of the Duchy that that policy was really the right one, and he would tell the House why. Under the Standing Orders of the House it was possible for the Committee of the Whole House to make alterations in the money part of a Bill and those changes could not be touched upon Report. Supposing the money provision of a Bill imposing a charge upon the people was brought in in Committee and that Bill was sent upstairs under the Standing Order, as he read it it would then be in the power of the eighty Members composing that Committee or such a quorum as attended, to transfer the whole of that charge from the taxes to the rates, and when it came back to the House and was discussed upon Report it would not be competent for the Whole House to discuss the matter and re-transfer that charge from the rates to the taxes. There were a great many other limitations on the Report stage which did not apply to the Committee stage. He had given one of a striking character, and he thought everyone would admit that they ought not to give up to a Committee of eighty Gentlemen power to do that with a Bill which the Whole House could reverse only by recommitting the Bill and going through the elaborate machinery which had been gone through upstairs. He thought that was a most dangerous condition in which to leave the matter, but he would not elaborate the point as he believed he was forcing an open door. As the President of the Board of Education shook his head, he thought it would be only fair to him if he were informed from the Treasury Bench whether the policy he was to deal with was that of the Chancellor of the Duchy or that of the Minister for Education. He could not speak again and he would hand to his right hon. friend near him, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the duty of continuing the debate, having regard to the difference of view between the Chancellor of the Duchy and that of the Minister for Education. If the view of the Chancellor of the Duchy was right their views were met, and it would be impossible to send to a Committee upstairs any Bill imposing a charge. That was all they asked for, and the discussion might at once come to an amicable termination if the Prime Minister, sitting in discreet immobility, like Aaron, between his two supporters, would get up and decide which was the correct view.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): Was it not Solomon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; not Solomon. The right hon. Gentleman has many resemblances to Solomon, but Solomon had to do not with two supporters but with two babies. [Cries of "No; one baby."] The right hon. Gentleman continuing said he must apologise to the House for having shown that simple Bible teaching was still necessary. What they wanted from the Prime Minister was a statement of whether it was the view of his colleague on his right or the view of his inestimably valuable colleague on his left that was to be given effect to.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.) said the right hon. Gentleman professed to have discovered a discordance between his right hon. friend and himself in regard to this subject, but it did not exist. The question was a very simple one. The difference arose between the two classes of Bills: those which involved a charge and those which imposed a tax. Bills which imposed a tax were exempted from the operation of the Standing Order, but Bills which involved a charge were not. The reason for this was obvious. Let them take, for instance, an ordinary Factory Act Amendment Bill in which there were fifty provisions dealing with the intricate provisions of the Factory Law which everybody would at once agree should go upstairs, and which would go upstairs. But the Bill might and probably would contain a clause providing for the appointment of an inspector, and that would involve a charge. The Bill itself did not provide the money; it did not impose any taxes which would do so, but the House would have the fullest opportunity of criticising that charge in Committee of the House when the money was voted on the Estimates. The Bill itself did not impose that charge, it merely provided for the appointment of a particular official who would subsequently be appointed and paid for by a Vote of the House which could be fully discussed in Committee. The whole case put forward by the hon. Members who moved and seconded the Amendment was really founded on a misapprehension of the facts. It was absolutely true as stated by his right hon. friend that a particular class of Bills which involved a charge must be introduced in Committee of the Whole House, and therefore he agreed that in regard to that class the House would have an opportunity in Committee and on Report of criticising the particular charge. The House had these two opportunities of discussing the matter, and if its attention was called to any wicked action of the Government, when the charge came before the House on the Estimates they could refuse to find the money. Even if such a Bill were carried through Report and Third Reading, if there was any element of surprise in it and hon. Members thought they had not had an opportunity of raising any question they could state their objections upon the Estimates.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD asked what guarantee they had of any discussion.

MR. McKENNA said he supposed the hon. Member meant that the Government might move the closure, but the hon. Member had this guarantee. Estimates were put down by arrangement with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and if there was any case of surprise or of the other side being taken unawares all they had to do was to ask the Chief Government Whip to put down for discussion the particular Estimate raising the question. There was no doubt that under this Resolution as it stood the House would be given an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to the charge. If on the other hand the House were misled into accepting the Amendment by the entirely imaginary dangers alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, it would mean that the very class of Bill which ought to go upstairs, such as a Factory Bill involving the appointment of inspectors or a Local Government Bill full of numerous details and involving the appointment of some medical inspector, would be precluded from being so dealt with. They might usefully take the course suggested by the Government. The hon. Gentleman had put forward a case of a charge on the taxes in the original Bill being altered upstairs into a charge on the rates and then said, with some truth, that any change of that character could not be altered on Report. But the Bill could be recommitted. It was perfectly open to move that the Bill be recommitted; the same questions would then arise, and the merits of the question would be discussed. Therefore he did not think the statement of the hon. Gentleman was strictly accurate. The Bill could either be recommitted upstairs on that particular clause or it could be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: Where is that preserved?

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: I did not see that.

MR. McKENNA said it was there, and that being so there was no danger. He thought therefore the House could accept this Resolution without hesitation.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said the House was indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for his clear and lucid explanation, but anyone who followed the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and heard also that of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would see that one statement was a flat contradiction of the other. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education had divided Bills imposing a charge on the public into two classes, Bills which imposed taxes, which the new Standing Order would retain in the House, and Bills which incidentally, without raising a tax, imposed a charge without providing the means by which that charge was to be met. That was in flat contradiction to what was stated by the Chancellor of the Duchy, who objected to the words moved by the hon. Member on the ground that they were surplusage. The words were not surplusage if the interpretation of the new Standing Order given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education was correct. It would be as well perhaps, if the Prime Minister would enlighten the House on this point. Was it the intention of the Government that such a Bill as the Army Bill should go upstairs? He asked the Prime Minister to give the House a definite statement, such as only the right hon. Gentleman himself could give, as to who was right, the Chancellor of the Duchy, or the President of the Board of Education. Did the Government intend that Bills imposing a charge in a clause printed in italics should be sent upstairs, or did they not? Certain of such Bills, no doubt, should go upstairs, but the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education, had instanced a Factory Bill, involving the appointment of additional inspectors, and creating a charge for that purpose, and had said that such a Bill ought to be sent upstairs. Was it the intention of the Government that such a Bill should go upstairs? He quite agreed that such a Bill might go upstairs, but he did not agree that every such Bill should go up automatically. That was, however, a very simple illustration of a Bill involving a small charge of which the House would not take much notice. But the Army Bill involved a charge of £2,000,000. If that had a clause in italics to say that funds should be paid to the county associations throughout the country it surely was not a Bill that should go upstairs automatically. That Bill ought to be referred only after full discussion as to whether it should be referred upstairs or not. In the case of all such Bills the procedure in the future ought to be the same as at present. A Motion ought to be made, and the House ought to be allowed to discuss it before dividing on it. That was the case raised by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education. But when that case had been swept out of the way larger cases of real financial responsibility were involved, and those ought to be retained for the consideration of the House. The financial control of the House, to be effective, must be exerted before the expenditure developed, and not when the money had been spent, and the time had come to pay. It was the habit of the House to reserve its aspirations for economy until the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his Budget, but it was impossible to cut down expenditure when the Chancellor of the Exchequer was asking for the money. If the House wished to control expenditure they must exercise their control the moment the tax was proposed. Supposing the Government introduced a measure to provide that certain sums should issue from the Consolidated Fund for certain Irish purposes, and that Bill was referred to a Committee of eighty Members, in which, owing to there being a special Committee sitting which the Scottish Members were attending, the great majority of the Members were English; if that Committee preferred to charge those sums to Irish funds, it would be impossible, when that Bill came back on report, to reverse that decision. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill might be recommitted. Certainly. But that was one of the inconveniences of this attempt to withdraw effective discussion from the House, to force them in future to do constantly what had been done very rarely in the past. The Motion to recommit would become constant in future. If the majority of the House tabled a Motion to recommit, had they power to discuss the merits of the question on such a Motion? The President of the Board of Education said they could, but he did not think that was quite plain. He believed that discussion on the Motion to recommit would be kept within very narrow limits, even if they could discuss at all the merits of the proposition in respect of which they moved to recommit. If they passed the Standing Order in the form in which it appeared, they would not only be doing what the Chancellor of the Duchy declared the Government had no desire to do and would not do, which it would be foolish and wicked of them to do, and he would vote with the Opposition against the Government if they attempted to do, but they would really seriously affect the powers of the House to deal with these matters. The Prime Minister had heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy, and that of the President of the Board of Education, and he appealed to him to say which of his two colleagues spoke the mind of the Government. The Chancellor of the Duchy had said that all Bills italicised would go upstairs. [AN HON MEMBER: No.] He would accept no one's contradiction on that point save that of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He asked the Prime Minister to tell them what really was the intention of the Government.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said he must turn back to what the Chancellor of the Duchy had said, because it had rather an important bearing on this point. The right hon. Gentleman had dwelt considerably on the important point that every money Resolution of any sort must be adopted in Committee of the Whole House and in the subsequent stage of Report, and that in that lay the protection of the House to look after its own interests so far as financial arrangements were concerned. But it was difficult to fit in the right hon. Gentleman's speech with a very pregnant remark which he made when he was acting as Chairman of the Committee of Procedure last year. When his right hon. friend the Member for the City of London was giving his evidence and describing his attitude towards these money Resolutions the Chancellor of the Duchy, at the end of his right hon. friend's remarks, said as Chairman that it would save time if he stated that it was the intention of the Government to submit proposals on the point in the form of a Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London said it would have his hearty support. From the Chancellor of the Duchy's attitude in the Committee upstairs, and from the definite statement he made then, it was evident that the Government had in their minds proposals to abolish these stages upon money Resolutions, and to take away from the House the opportunity of dealing with financial matters. If those opportunities were to be taken away, and they apparently were what the Chancellor of the Duchy mostly relied upon, he thought they ought to be advised where the opportunity for discussion in the House would occur in any way whatever in regard to Bills which imposed charges. He would like to have a statement in reference to that from the Prime Minister, because he thought they ought to be authoritatively advised, when a member of the Government relied on those stages which would afford the House an opportunity of discussing these financial matters, and at the same time told them that the Government intended to abolish those stages. The Minister for Education had laid great stress on the opportunities given by the Estimates. The charges made in a Bill were not provided for by the Estimates until the next year, or at the very earliest by the Supplementary Estimates. Therefore the money clauses of a Bill could never be really considered in many cases until practically a year after the legislation, had come into operation. That, therefore, was a perfectly illusory argument to put forward; it was one which must be put aside altogether. It was proposed to have a Scottish Grand Committee and, as they understood, the same thing for Wales, and surely they ought to consider very carefully how they parted with their control over money matters, when it was proposed to give extended powers to different parts of the country. When they were dealing with an entirely new condition of things the House ought to be jealous of one of its earliest constitutional privileges, and to keep control over money matters, especially as the Government themselves intended, apparently, to take from them some of their most ancient rights, in regard to financial subjects.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) was understood to say that the argument of the President of the Board of Education was wholly illusory, and he would be borne out by Members of the House when he stated that the tendency of recent decisions from the Chair had been very greatly to restrict discussion of details on an enabling Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman had said that they could have a discussion on the Estimates, but, as his hon. friend had shown, that was a great deal too late. When they reached that late stage they would have arrived at the other side of a vicious circle, because they would be told that Parliament had already authorised the expenditure, and to say then that it should not be met would really be stultifying the previous decision of the House. He agreed that there might be some philanthropic Bills, Factory Bills and others—even philanthropy had its expensive side—which were perhaps not quite appropriate to be retained down stairs as regarded all their provisions. Therefore, what they were really anxious for was not only that there should be some provision by which the enabling Resolution should be discussed downstairs, but also that they should have full opportunity of criticising and of submitting verbal Amendments to the actual money clauses inserted in the Bill. In regard to the opportunity afforded for discussion on the Estimates, he might point out that some of the charges were upon the Consolidated Fund, and did not come upon the Estimates at all. In view of the illusory character of the security relied on, and knowing that some of them were willing to compromise on the matter, he wished to know how the Government viewed the proposal that the money clauses should be kept downstairs, while the other part of the Bill, which did not propose charges on public funds, should be discussed upstairs.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said an appeal had been made to him by right hon. Gentlemen opposite to settle matters between his two colleagues, and to act as a sort of umpire between them. He had interjected across the Table a remark correcting the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of Scripture, suggesting that he would find Solomon a better character to refer to than Aaron. How he came to bring in Aaron he could not imagine. Aaron was the right-hand man and was not the man in the centre on the occasion referred to. But, from his administrative experience, he had the greatest admiration for Solomon, because he regarded him as the great inventor of the principle of method which was the most useful that he knew of in matters of administration, the method known as "splitting the difference." He had hardly ever known of a dispute between two parties on some question of public policy which was incapable of being solved by that noble and traditional procedure. But speaking seriously, he unfortunately did not observe any difference between his two colleagues. They might have been looking at two sides of the shield, but the shield was the same. What was it they had been talking about all this time? There was no difference of opinion among them as to maintaining in future the functions and responsibilities of the House on all matters of finance. At all events they did not wish to lessen the control of the House over all the burdens of the people and questions which affected the finances of the country. Accordingly, in order to keep the full control of the Committee of the Whole House over everything that was really of importance in that connection, they exempted Bills imposing taxation, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills. Everyone would admit that that was nine hundred and ninety-nine thousandths of the financial business which came before the House. Occasionally, it was said, there was a Bill involving expenditure, perhaps on the appointment of an additional factory inspector. But was that any reason for keeping back a Bill which could best be discussed in detail upstairs? Was that any reason why a great health Bill or a Bill dealing with factories, containing perhaps a hundred or more clauses, should be kept back when they believed—and this was the assumption they were proceeding upon—that the work of dealing with those matters would be better done in a Committee upstairs than in the House itself? Because of one little clause was the whole of this policy and the machinery and restrictions set up for the protection of public health to be vitiated and the people deprived of this advantage? He could not imagine anything more absurd than that suggestion; it would be carrying pedantry to an extreme. He quite admitted that there might be money clauses in Bills of a more important type. He did not wish to commit his right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War; but if the clause in his Bill involved anything like the number of millions which had been suggested by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, then he was unquestionably of the opinion that it ought to be dealt with in Committee of this House. [AN HON. MEMBER: The whole Bill?] No. Why the whole Bill? Why should the whole Bill be discussed in Committee because of one clause? If it was important and if it was thought desirable that some clause involving a real and substantial draft upon the public resources should be kept in the House, they had provided the means of doing that in the latter part of the rule, which said that the House might on Motion made by the Member in charge of a Bill commit the Bill to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions, and commit it to the Committee of the Whole House in respect of other of its provisions. He was greatly shocked and distressed to hear the hon. Member who moved the Amendment casting discredit upon the Committee of Selection by implying that it was, or might be, partisan in its action. One of the chief matters on which they had to congratulate themselves was the implicit confidence which the House had always deservedly displayed in that Committee and the Committee on Standing Orders, whose members set aside their Party feeling in the way in which at the beginning of the proceedings of the House they prayed to be enabled to do. He regretted the language the hon. Member had used and the implication he had made. The very thing which the hon. Member considered so dreadful might happen any day under the present rule. A Bill might go up to one of the Standing Committees and there was nothing to prevent the very thing complained of happening, and this Rule did not increase the disability under which the House rested. As his right hon. friend had already pointed out, they could move to recommit a Bill with respect to any particular clause. The case put forward appeared to him to be perfectly imaginary, and the whole situation was met by the proposal that the House should have the power to determine which part of a Bill should go upstairs and which should remain in the House. They were all of the same mind in regard to the necessity of retaining the control of the House over financial matters, and he believed that was secured by the Rule proposed. Therefore as the Government thought the words were unnecessary they opposed the Amendment.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said his remarks had no reference whatever to the Committee of Selection. What he had deprecated was the reference in the new Standing Order, for the first time, to "the balance of parties."

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said the kind of Bill they had in their minds was not one which appointed an additional inspector, but a Bill like the Local Government Act of 1888, which entirely reversed the whole system of local taxation. Surely the Prime Minister would not deny that the consideration of such measures from beginning to end should be confined to the House. The Prime Minister had pointed to subsection (2) of the Standing Order as sufficient for the purpose. The remedy which the right hon. Gentleman applied was grossly illusory. The Prime Minister had admitted that proposals such as had been suggested might be found in the Bills for which private Members were responsible. Under the present arrangement such a Bill could not go to one of the Grand Committees unless a Motion was made, but now the reverse would become the practice, and a Bill would go to a Grand Committee unless a Motion to the contrary was made. A grievance existed, the Prime Minister had admitted it, and would lead them to believe that it would be remedied by sub-section (2). Who was to judge whether Bills were of sufficient importance to be retained in Committee of the Whole House? Was the programme of the present Government so advanced that they were in a position to say impartially what Bills should be retained in Committee of the Whole House? The importance of Bills ought not to be judged by the hundreds, or thousands, or millions they involved. They might involve considerable changes apart from the amount of money. The Prime Minister had admitted that in many cases there would be justification for keeping Bills in Committee of the Whole House. It was, therefore, incumbent on the Government to make the rule operative in the way they said they meant it to apply. It surely could not be beyond their power to give effect to what they had said was their intention. It was obvious that he and his hon. friends must continue their opposition to a proposal which would remove from the House entire control of some of their most important business.

MR. DALZIEL understood that the claim of the Opposition was that the House should give up none of its authority and power with regard to financial matters. He thought that was a reasonable claim which it was right to press. He understood that the Government fully accepted that view of the position, and that they desired the House to retain the full control which it had at the present time. That also was a position capable of being understood. The point was, how were they to deal with clauses in italics where charges were involved? The machinery was apt to get complicated unless they dealt with a matter at the commencement of the operation. If a Bill went upstairs the question of recommittal would be difficult. In order to carry out what he understood was the intention of the Government he moved, as an Amendment to the Amendment, to insert after the word "or" the words "clauses of."

MR. MOND (Chester) seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"After the first word 'or,' to insert the words 'clauses of.'"—(Mr. Dalziel.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) did not think that any procedure which merely kept certain clauses of a Bill in the House would really meet the difficulty. He confessed that he was a little of a sceptic on the whole subject, because he regarded the control of the House of Commons as to a great extent disappearing owing to the rapidly increasing power of the Executive. One thing quite certain was that the control of the House of Commons depended for its effect upon its control over the authorisation of expenditure and not over taxation. When expenditure was incurred the debt was authorised. What would be thought of the statement that a manager of a business was not to be entitled to give the orders of that business, but that he was to be entitled to review the payments and draw the cheques when the payments became due? Taxing was merely the payment of the cheques. The whole liability had been already incurred; it was merely a question as to how it was to be met. When they talked of reserving for the House in Committee the taxation clauses and not the Bill authorising expenditure there was some confusion of thought. If they preserved the control of the House of Commons at all they must preserve control over those Bills which authorised the expenditure. He did not think the suggestion of the Prime Minister would really deal with the matter at all. If there was in a Bill one clause dealing in so many words with the actual charge which was to be expected, that was to be retained for Committee of the Whole House, whereas the whole machinery which brought that charge into being was to be sent upstairs to be dealt with by a Standing Committee. The thing was an absurdity. If they were to retain control over expenditure, they must retain the whole Bill, and a device to divide the Bill into fragments was really not worthy of the consideration of the House.

MR. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.) said that it was not often that he agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, but he regretted the character of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy and he hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not press it, because he believed that it would entirely vitiate the proposals of the Procedure Committee, and make the condition of affairs very much worse than at present. The right hon. Member for South Dublin had evidently forgotten, when speaking of the effect of this proposal on private Bills, that the custom was to send such Bills upstairs whether they contained a financial clause or not. The effect of the Amendment would be that every financial clause of every public or private Bill would require to be considered by Committee of the Whole House. He put it to the House whether that was a reasonable proposal. It was quite refreshing to hear hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House arguing for the full financial control of the House of Commons when they remembered the system adopted in the last Parliament. If the Amendment were passed it would make public business practically impossible, because there were many Bills with a financial clause which did not really involve a new charge. He did not believe that even the Army Bill involved a new charge; it merely proposed to dispose of the money voted in the Estimates in a new direction. It did not increase the charge but reduced it.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) did not think that the Amendment to the Amendment was at all practicable. For instance, the Education Bill of last year had one small clause authorising the spending of a million of money. Would it have been practicable to have kept that clause in Committee of the Whole House and sent the rest of the Bill upstairs? On the other hand the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that an Old Age Pensions Bill to provide a pension of 5s. per week to every man on reaching sixty-five years of age would involve a charge of £35,000,000 a year. Such a measure as that should be considered by Committee of the Whole House. What his hon. friend meant by his Amendment was that Bills containing a handsome charge against the public funds should be kept in the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he could not quite agree with what had fallen from his hon. friend behind him. He would prefer the Amendment as originally proposed, but he certainly thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy Burghs was better than nothing. He did not quite agree that it would be unworkable or impracticable. In discussing the financial clause of a Bill reference must be made to other portions of the Bill; but the House would not amend the other clauses of the Bill which embodied the general policy of the measure. That would be the work of the Committee upstairs. The Committee of the Whole House would only amend the financial clause or clauses of the Bill. He thought that the Prime Minister and the Minister for Education also took that view. Although he would have preferred the wider, clearer, and more consistent words which his hon. friend moved at the beginning of the sitting, he hoped that if the Government would not adopt what he considered the best course, they would take the second best course. He was prepared to support the Government if they accepted the concession proposed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy.

MR. MCKENNA regretted that the Government could not accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. In a great majority of Bills like Factory Bills and Local Government Bills which involved a charge, the charge was a mere incident. Under the procedure proposed by his hon. friend they would have in every case to divide such Bills into two parts—practically the whole Bill being sent upstairs, while some insignificant clause was kept for consideration in Committee of the Whole House. With what result? That particular clause would have to be put down for discussion early in the sitting.

MR. DALZIEL said that it would not take up any time if it was a very small matter.

MR. MCKENNA thought that his hon. friend's experience when he sat on the other side of the House must have shown him that a great deal of time might be occupied in Committee of the Whole House in discussing a minor part of a Bill. That would be a wholly unnecessary procedure. There were cases, of course, in which the charge on the public funds was a material part of the Bill, and in such cases the control of the House ought to be retained. The Prime Minister had admitted that it ought to be retained, and that could be done under the second part of the rule on the Motion of a member of the Government. Something should be left to the discretion of the Government of the day, who would most certainly be punished if that discretion were not exercised wisely and in accordance with the general feeling of the House. No Government would insist on sending upstairs a Bill which contained a clause that should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House, because time would be wasted in discussing it on the Report stage. He submitted, however, that the proper authority to decide whether a Bill should be divided should be the Minister in charge.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said the reply of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to be not merely unsatisfactory and inconclusive, but to contain elements which were self-destructive. The right hon. Gentleman had said that after all the House must be content to trust the Minister who was in charge of the Bill as to whether or not it should be sent upstairs, and that no Minister would be so foolish as to send a Bill upstairs when there was anything like a general feeling that it should be retained for consideration in the House. He did not know what the right hon. Gentleman meant by "general feeling." It might mean the feeling of those who by their vote would support a proposal to retain the measure, or it might mean a general feeling in each quarter of the House. The right hon. Gentleman was now speaking from the Treasury Bench, but it was not so long ago since he sat in Opposition, and if such an appeal for confidence in the Minister had been made to him then, he would have rejected it with scorn and an expression of surprise that the late Government should have asked for it. But this Resolution did not apply merely to Bills in charge of Ministers, but to those brought forward by private Members. Even if they were prepared to delegate this great responsibility to His Majesty's Ministers, who naturally from their position would be more cautious than private Members, there was no reason why they should be ready to confer the same power upon the latter. [AN HON. MEMBER: But Bills go upstairs now.] No doubt that was the case, but they did not go up automatically. The hon. Member did not seem to have read the proposed rule; it was entirely different from that now prevailing. The different arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman were absurd and contradictory, and, for himself, he thought that the Committee stage of all Bills imposing charges or the portions of them dealing with money should be retained in the House.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said the President of the Board of Education seemed to think it impracticable to send a Bill upstairs and to retain the money clauses in the House, but evidently he had forgotten the second portion of the Motion which contemplated that a Bill might be committed to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions and to Committee of the Whole House in respect of other provisions. The object they had in view was, that the parts which should be kept for consideration in Committee of the Whole House should be the money clauses. If it was possible and practicable to send a portion of the clauses upstairs and to keep a portion downstairs, why should they not send upstairs the portions which were not financial and keep exclusively for the consideration of the House those portions which were financial? It appeared to him that they ought to pause before they parted with one of the last remains of the rights of the House to prevent burdens being placed upon the people without the fullest and amplest opportunities for criticism and discussion. He could understand that his original Amendment not to send upstairs a Bill containing a small financial clause might be open to objection, but they had had a suggestion made from the other side which he confessed struck him as a reasonable one, that the money clauses of a Bill should be dealt with in the House. It was, however, perfectly hopeless to ask the Government to accept the whole Amendment, but they might accept it with the Amendment proposed. When one could not get a whole loaf one was prepared to accept half.

MR. DALZIEL asked leave to withdraw his Amendment as the Government had refused to make the small concession it involved. He thought they were making a mistake, and would save time by accepting it, but he would not press it.

Leave to withdraw being refused,

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Lord R. CECIL said he proposed to move to add at the end of the Amendment "provided that such a Bill may be committed to a Standing Committee by Motion made." That would preserve the existing state of things with reference to particular Bills.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. LAURENCE HARDY moved an Amendment with the object of exempting from the proposed rule "Bills relating to Parliamentary reform or franchise." He did not see how the Government could seriously object to that proposal, because such measures would always be of that character which all the members of the Government who had spoken on the subject had said they desired to exclude from the Rule. They were of such vital importance that he thought it was desirable that they should be removed from the region of doubt, and therefore he suggested that all Bills connected with the franchise and Parliamentary reform should be considered by a Committee of the Whole House. It had always been the custom that after a Reform Bill had become law the Government which had passed it came to an end. A measure which involved the destruction of the Parliament which passed it was one which should not be sent to a small Committee. Every hon. Member had a right to take part in the deliberations upon a measure which was practically altering the constitution of the House of Commons. Surely it was highly desirable that there should be no doubt upon those points. Let them take, for example, a Bill connected with woman suffrage. It would be impossible in the case of such a measure for the Committee of Selection to find a Grand Committee which would give satisfaction to the House. It was not possible that a Committee of some sixty Members could form an adequately representative body to consider measures of that character, especially when they remembered the far-reaching results which must follow from very slight Amendments made in Committee. A very small Amendment in a Woman Suffrage Bill might extend the franchise to the whole of the women in the country. He thought they could justly contend that it was the right of every hon. Member to take part in all discussions which dealt with any alteration in the constitution of the House. Then there was the question of redistribution. Was it reasonable to argue that any measure redistributing seats could be properly considered in a Committee upstairs? Each constituency upon such a question had a right to be heard, and it would be impossible to have their interests properly represented upon a Committee upstairs. He did not suppose for a moment that the Government would ever have suggested that the Plural Voting Bill of last session should be sent to a Grand Committee. It was self-evident that Bills of that nature clearly came within the category of those measures which every Member of the Government had said ought to be excluded. Therefore it was necessary that such Bills should be included in the schedule which the Government had put forward for exemption. The Government had introduced a schedule to exclude money Bills and Provisional Orders, and this Amendment only added one more class to the list. He trusted that his Amendment would be accepted, and a long debate avoided.

*MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) seconded. It was often said that Bills should be sent upstairs in order that they might receive expert treatment, and because they could there be better scrutinised than by a Committee of the Whole House. As regarded Redistribution Bills that argument did not hold good, because before such Bills could be brought in a Commission had to be appointed to take evidence as to population, areas, and other matters, in order to assist the Government in framing their Bill. Therefore all the necessary expert evidence would have been obtained before the introduction of the Bill and there could be no necessity for such Bills going to a Committee upstairs. In the case of a Franchise Bill or a Redistribution Bill every hon. Member ought to have an opportunity of speaking, because changes in the franchise affected every elector. Let them imagine he feelings of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, whose constituency contained about 1,500 electors, if it was proposed that his constituency should be disfranchised without his being allowed to have a say in the matter. What would be the feelings of the hon. Member for Romford, which constituency had 45,000 electors, if he was not allowed to appear before the Committee upstairs and defend the rights and claims of his constituency. He cordially supported the Amendment because such Bills if they were not discussed in Committee of the Whole House would not be properly considered or the interests of the electors of the United Kingdom properly looked after.

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words '(c) Bills relating to Parliamentary reform or franchise.' "—(Mr. Laurence Hardy).

Question proposed, "That those words be their inserted."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he was sure the hon. Member would expect the announcement that the Government were not able to accept this Amendment or any other similar proposal on the Paper to exempt certain Bills from the operation of the Rule. They could not be accepted, because they would have the effect of taking away the discretion which the House possessed in the conduct of its business, and would narrow the scope of operation of the Rules. The Government were proposing these changes because they conscientiously believed they would effect a great improvement in the proceedings of the House and expedite legislative business. They ought not to shut out such questions as Parliamentary Reform, Bills which aroused strong political controversy or excited acute religious susceptibilities; Bills modifying or taking away any of the powers of the Crown or either House of Parliament; Bills dealing with the organisation of the Army or Reserve Forces, or with the Navy; Bills relating to the maintenance, organisation, or discipline of the Navy or naval service; Bills to create a subordinate Legislature in any part of the United Kingdom; Bills to ratify treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements; Bills to sanction the cession of any territory forming part of the dominions of the Crown, and other matters; these were measures which ought to be left to the judgment of the House to decide. The Rule as proposed left the House to judge at the time whether a Bill should be reserved for consideration in Committee of the Whole House. While the Government must resist all Amendments of this character, there was one point upon which he was willing to meet hon. Members opposite, and that was in the matter of giving additional breadth and freedom to the discussions on the Report stage of a Bill which had not been considered in Committee of the Whole House. There was an Amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University which said—

"Where a Bill has been committed under the foregoing provision of this Standing Order a Member shall have the same right of speaking on the consideration of the Report of such Committee as if the Bill was before a Committee of the Whole House."

That would give the House in the case of a Bill considered upstairs the power to discuss it as if they were in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition pointed out the other day with great force that it would greatly hamper the proper discussion of Bills which had not been considered in Committee of the Whole House, if the Members in charge of them, and other Members interested in them, had not an opportunity of speaking more than once. He did not believe if this concession were made that it would greatly increase the opportunities for misapplying time, but even if it did it would enlarge the powers of the House on the Report stage, so that, if something was lost on the Committee stage, it would be regained on the Report stage. Its terms might be improved, but the Government were perfectly willing to accept the spirit of the Amendment. Therefore, he did not think there should be so such apprehension as seemed to prevail that the Government wished to impose undue restriction on the powers of the House itself. There would be thorough investigation of the details of a Bill upstairs, and hen when it came down on the Report stage there would be opportunity for discussion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that, while this was an improvement of the original plan, yet it but increased the objection he had always felt to the general scheme, namely, that it would tend to increase the enormous burden which the rest of the Rules would throw upon the Report stage. It was evident that the Report stage would become the Committee stage, with the double disadvantage, that on Report they would not be able to discuss money matters, and on Report the Government would not have a locus pœnitentiœ or opportunity for carrying into effect the Amendments which in substance the arguments of the House had induced them to accept. It must conduce to hasty and bad drafting of measures. In future the traditional practice of the House by which the Committee work was done with the Chairman in the Chair would go by the board, and henceforth Mr. Speaker would have the whole burden thrown on his shoulders, not merely of supervising the Second Reading debates and all Resolutions, but, in fact, the whole of the Committee work as well. He thought that was to be regretted from the point of view of the Chair. As to the Amendment now before the House, what did the Prime Minister say? He said that the Amendment, and all the Amendments that followed it, were to be rejected because they interfered with the discretion of the House. The discretion of the House would be far better carried out if this Amendment were accepted thanif the Prime Minister's plan were adhered to. The right hon. Gentleman had said it would be in the power of the House if it liked to keep all these measures downstairs, because any one could move a Motion to that effect and it could be divided upon. The question whether a Bill was to be retained or sent upstairs would be settled by the whips of the Party in power, and it was natural that it should be so. He was the last man to quarrel with Party discipline. There was to be no argument on the Motion; the rule was so framed that argument would be precluded, and if the Government wanted a Bill to go upstairs, upstairs it would go. Might he ask the Government seriously what their objection was to the Amendment now before the House? The Prime Minister had stated that they might multiply indefinitely the subjects which were not to be sent to Committees upstairs. Of course, it was the tendency of the critics of a Bill to multiply objections, and he quite granted that that might be carried to excess. But surely it was eminently reasonable that the House should be asked to except from the scope of the Rule matters which touched the Constitution of the country. Surely they might except from the operation of the Rule changes affecting the Crown and the constitution of the House. He could understand the Government saying that some of the Amendments of which notice had been given were so wide in their scope as to include Bills which ought to be sent upstairs, but even the Prime Minister and his colleagues would admit that a Franchise Bill was not one which should be sent upstairs. If they were all agreed upon that, why could they not embody it in the Resolution? The right hon. Gentleman had said that no Government would think of sending a Bill of that kind upstairs, because it would be such a violent reversal of the old practice, and that they might trust any Government to abstain from such a course. Let it be remembered that the intentions with which Governments brought forward Rules, when they did not embody those intentions in the Rules themselves, were very apt to be forgotten, and if they were remembered, they were very apt to be deliberately violated. Mr. Gladstone said that no Bills which excited violent religious controversy were ever to be sent to the Grand Committees. But they all knew that, though those were the intentions animating the Prime Minister of the day when the Grand Committees were instituted, subsequent Prime Ministers had departed from the rule—he was not quite sure that Mr. Gladstone himself did not depart from it—because they found it more convenient to send upstairs Bills which came under that rubric when they found it impossible to resist the pressure from sections of the House. Looking to the experience of the past, let them do their best to embody in the Resolution all the exceptions which they meant to make, and not trust to intentions which might in years to come be forgotten. They were not legislating only for this or the next Parliament. They were legislating for the practice of the House through many successive Parliaments. In these circumstances let them lay it down that Bills making vital changes in the constitution of the House, or in the relation of the House to the Crown, or in the relation of the House to the Colonies, should be absolutely excluded from being sent to a Committee upstairs. The Government admitted that Bills imposing charges on the Consolidated Fund, or Appropriation Bills, should not be sent upstairs. Why should the Prime Minister exempt Budget Bills and not a Franchise or a Woman Suffrage Bill? He thought an ordinary Budget was of incomparably less importance than a Franchise Bill. What comparison was there between an ordinary Budget, such as they had been accustomed to in recent years, and a Woman Franchise Bill? Why should they put down in a Standing Order one class of Bills to be within the rules, and another class not? It was part of a superstition of Parliament that the only thing of real importance was Money Bills, and that the whole function of the House was to deal with those Money Bills, and through them to have control over the Executive of the country. He did not see why they should frame Rules of Procedure for 1907 which might have been necessary in 1607. Their dangers now were not in connection with contests with the Crown over money. Their difficulties in the future would be as to the Constitution of the country, as to the great questions affecting the constitution of that House, and other matters of suchlike importance. Let them; at all events, frame their rules that such questions must be considered not merely on the Report stage, but in the Committee stage, and not stultify themselves by making exceptions which dealt with matters relevantly unimportant, while they left the most important things which a representative assembly could have under its consideration to the not very tender mercies of a Committee upstairs.

Mr. DALZIEL said he was very pleased that the Government had announced their opposition to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite; but he had listened with some surprise, if not with alarm, to the momentous statement of the Prime Minister with regard to the Report stage of Bills which came down from the Standing Committees. He thought that if that statement were given effect to, and that any Member could speak on the Report stage as often as he liked, it would greatly damage the authority and the whole organisation of the Standing Committees.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN thought that it was for the convenience of the House that the Prime Minister should have made his statement at that time, and that they should take the opportunity of debating it now rather than later on. He would press upon the right hon. Gentleman the point put by his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, which was germane to the particular Amendment they were now discussing. The Prime Minister had made his case against the Amendment, not on its merits, but on the merits of other Amendments on the Paper. The fact that one might multiply Amendments of a kind was not an argument against a particular Amendment. The Prime Minister had admitted that there must be exceptions in the case of Money Bills. Let him reinforce what his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition had said as to the relative importance of a Franchise Bill such as was contemplated in the Amendment now before the House, and an ordinary Budget or Money Bill. He was inclined to think that the House was too apt to have a superstitious reverence for the cumbrous procedure of the Middle Ages.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Why did not the right hon. Gentleman say that two hours ago?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he would do away not with the stage which the Prime Minister wanted to do away with, but with another stage; and in regard to all minor Bills make no exceptions. He thought that their financial procedure was cumbrous, and he would remind the House that while any provision of the Finance Bill could be repealed in the year following its enactment if the Government were dissatisfied with it, they could not recede from any step taken on a measure dealing with Parliamentary reform or the franchise. There was another point on finance procedure. A Finance Bill must be based on a series of Resolutions introduced in Committee of the Whole House. Those Resolutions were discussed in Committee, again on the Report of the Resolutions, again in Committee of the Bill itself, and yet again on the Report of the Bill. So that every Finance Bill had to pass through two stages more than a Franchise Bill. In those circumstances, and the Government having thought it necessary to preserve the procedure on a Finance Bill, how could they possibly say that it was unreasonable to preserve the Committee stage in regard to a matter which was of even greater importance?

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

SIR F. BANBURY moved an Amendment to exempt from the operation of the proposed new Rule Bills modifying or taking away any of the powers of the Crown or of either House of Parliament. He said that a short time ago the Prime Minister had stated that he could not accept any of the Amendments on the Paper, but he was inclined to think that the right hon. Gentleman could not have seen this Amendment when he made that statement. He could not think that any Minister, however democratic, would refer Bills dealing with the powers of the Crown or of either House of Parliament to a Grand Committee of between sixty and eighty Members. Such matters should be dealt with in Committee of the Whole House. It might be right or wrong to add to or curtail the powers of the Crown, but they should not be considered by a Committee which, roughly speaking, contained only one-tenth of the representation of the people. He did not want to go into the question of the manner of selection of these Committees, nor did he cast any reflection upon the Committee of Selection, of whom he had a high opinion. He agreed with the Prime Minister that when the Members arrived in the Committee room all Party feelings dropped; but they could not forget that one of these new Standing Orders directed the attention of the Committee to the state of Parties in connection with the selection of Committees. He believed it was the first time that in the Standing Orders the question of Party had been raised at all, or any explicit direction given on that subject to the Committee of Selection. [Mr. McKenna dissented.] Well, he spoke subject to correction. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would like to explain.

Mr. McKENNA said he would wait till he came to reply to the Amendment.

Sir F. BANBURY said the point was not a vital one, because, of course, it told both ways. The right hon. Gentleman who now represented the Government told them a short time ago that the Minister in charge of a Bill was to be the sole judge to determine what course should be pursued with regard to that Bill. It could not, however, in his judgment be tolerated that a Bill dealing with the powers of the Crown should be in the hands of one single individual, however competent.

Mr. McKENNA said that if the hon. Baronet would look at the Standing Order he would see that the question was not determined by the Minister in charge of the Bill, but by the House.

Sir F. BANBURY said that meant nothing if the Minister in charge of the Bill made a Motion on the subject.

Mr. McKENNA: No, no. The hon. Baronet has not read the Standing Order.

Sir F. BANBURY said that, supposing he were to move, as it would be in the power of any hon. Member to do, immediately after the Second Reading that a Bill should be retained in the House, there would be no debate, and it would be decided by the vote of the House acting on the views of the Government.

Mr. McKENNA said he was only objecting to the statement that he had said that the sole arbiter was the Minister in charge of the Bill.

Sir F. BANBURY said that if the right hon. Gentleman did not say that he apologised. It was a misunderstanding, but it came to exactly the same thing, because unless the Minister in charge of the Bill felt that it ought to remain in the House it went automatically upstairs, and it was absolutely futile to say that any Member on the Opposition side of the House could move to retain it, as he would have no prospect of success against the Minister in charge. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman meant to infer that Government tellers would not be put on, that really altered the situation.

Mr. McKENNA said he was only correcting the statement which the hon. Baronet made, and no inference of that nature could be drawn from his remarks.

Sir F. BANBURY replied that he could only say that the safeguard, unless the Government withdrew their tellers, would be worth nothing. He was inclined to regard the right hon. Gentleman as a partisan in this case, because he had only shown that there were safeguards—which, in his opinion, did not exist—which would enable a Bill to be retained in the House. But why run any risk? Why not make it certain that such a Bill of the sort suggested must remain in the House? Coming to the second part of the Amendment which dealt with interference with the powers of either House of Parliament, his proposal was a very important one in view of what was taking place at the present time. He was not quite so sure that the right hon. Gentleman or the Party opposite would be inclined to accept that part of the Amendment, although he thought they ought to do so, because they contended that the country was with them. How could they tell whether the country was with the Government or with anybody else who brought in such a proposal, unless they left the decision to the unfettered discretion of Parliament. If the Government brought in a Bill dealing with the powers of a particular House of Parliament and left that measure to the tender mercies of sixty, eighty, or ninety-five Members, how could they answer for it that there would be anything like a decisive expression of opinion commending itself to the feelings of the country? What would be said of such a Committee in which Members representing those who desired to preserve the existing powers would be outvoted and overwhelmed? Could such a Committee be taken as representative of the feeling of the country or of the Members of the House? This question involved the whole government of the country, and it seemed to him that, if ever there was on the part of a Government installed by fortuitous circumstances in a particular place an attempt to gerrymander the Constitution of the country by a side-wind, it was this. Because these rules were not introduced for this particular purpose, but in order to expedite business. The right hon. Gentleman would not say the alteration of the powers of another place was going to take place every session. It was a thing which would only occur once in every twenty or thirty years, or at even longer intervals. The right hon. Gentleman surely would not deny that the House had a right to consider in that time proposals which were practically as revolutionary as the attitude of Cromwell when he, with a company of what was now the Coldstream Guards, entered the House of Commons and removed the mace from the Table. He had endeavoured to show that his Amendment would not interfere with the facilitation of business; that the questions with which it dealt could only arise at long intervals; and that when such important questions did arise it was absolutely necessary that the representatives of the people should have an opportunity of discussing them fully in this Assembly. He begged to move.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham), in seconding, expressed his strong conviction that this Amendment should be accepted. He had always had the greatest admiration of the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Resolution, but he thought it would tax all his ingenuity to find any argument against the Amendment. He would probably argue that the probabilities of such Bills being brought in was very small, and that when brought in they might be dealt with by a Committee of the Whole House. The day had gone by for leaving anything to chance or luck, and it was therefore necessary to safeguard themselves from anything which was likely to injure the reputation of the House. He thought it would be calculated to injure the reputation of the House if a Bill such as either of the two mentioned by the hon. Baronet were dealt with in any other way than by a Committee of the Whole House. He failed to see what objection there could possibly be to the Amendment. It really carried out the principles of the Resolution, which were to safeguard the House against a Bill of very important character, or one the character of which required that it should be discussed in the House, being sent upstairs.

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, '(c) Bills modifying or taking away any of the powers of the Crown or either House of Parliament.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Questions proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MCKENNA said the answer to the Amendment was much simpler than the noble Lord who had just sat down imagined. It was that these Bills were not, as he thought, Bills which arose once or twice in every century. His experience in the House had been short, but it had been long enough for him to have been responsible for two such measures. Last session he introduced two Bills, both of which modified the powers of the Crown—the Crown Lands Bill and the Treasury Powers Bill. The first dealt with the powers of the Board of Agriculture, and the second measure transferred from the Treasury to the Local Government Board the sanction for loans, and also dealt with rights to the foreshore. In both cases the character of the Bills was such as obviously made them suitable to go before a Committee upstairs. Indeed, nearly all departmental Bills in some way affected the powers of the Crown, and it was generally agreed that they should go for examination before a Committee. It was inconceivable, however, that great constitutional measures would be withdrawn from discussion in the House itself. Half the trouble of these debates arose from the fact that hon. Members only started to read the proposals when they began to discuss them.

Was it conceivable that the House would allow great constitutional changes —changes as great as those effected by Cromwell when he removed the mace—to be discussed merely by a Committee upstairs? If the House was so unreasonable then indeed he could not conceive why such measures should not be discussed by reasonable men upstairs. If the House did not trust the Government they must trust themselves, and they had full power to punish any Government which should so misuse its power as to send great constitutional questions to any of these Committees. He appealed to hon. Members not to continue the discussion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said the right hon. Gentleman's defence was ingenious but not conclusive. He had given as an illustration two Bills which he last session had referred to Standing Committees—the Treasury Powers Bill and the Crown Lands Bill—and had said that those Bills affected the powers of the Crown. But that was not the wording of the Amendment. The Amendment said "modify or take away." There was a substantial difference between "affecting" and "modifying or taking away." Those Bills did not modify or take away any power of the Crown. What they did was to transfer the powers from one department of the Crown to another. He thought the silence of the right hon. Gentleman showed that he had destroyed his argument. He agreed that there were little Bills of the kind which had been referred to which ought to go upstairs, and if that could be prevented by the Amendment they would be very glad to have words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman which would take them out of the category covered by the Amendment. But he did not think that they would come under its words. As to the big Bills, the right hon. Gentleman had said that all their opposition arose from the fact that they did not read the Standing Order. Though it was in the power of any Member to move that the Bill be retained in the House, that was absolutely no protection to the minority. The only protection to the minority in the House was two-fold. In the first place it was in the sense of responsibility, fair play, and what was due to the dignity of the House and of its Members possessed by the Government of the day, and especially by the Leader of the House. In the second place, if that was insufficient, it was in the opportunity of the minority to make their case before the House, and every one who had been in the House any time could recollect occasions when, if the Government had taken a division at once, they would have had a full majority, but when, after a two hours discussion, the Government had either withdrawn or modified their proposal or carried it by a remarkably reduced majority. It was not until they had a discussion in the House that they could ascertain whether or not a proposal was reasonable.

MR. McKENNA: The Motion can be made immediately after the Second Reading discussion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that was a distinct Motion, and was put without discussion. His forecast was that the result of the Standing Order would be that on a Bill with a shadow of contention about it a Motion to keep it in the House would be made by some one as a matter of course, and equally as a matter of course, and without giving the question two minutes consideration, the majority would vote that it should go upstairs. That was no protection to the minority. The safegard which the right hon. Gentleman held out to them, that they could always divide the House, was merely an opportunity for them to make a protest; it was no opportunity to make their view prevail. The only other safeguard lay in the intention or the moderation of the Government of the day. The right hon. Gentleman had repeated phrases, used by other Members of the Government, that it would be absurd and unreasonable to send to a Committee upstairs a great constitutional measure. But the Prime Minister had used an ominous phrase just now. He had said, as regarded the particular Amendment under discussion, that its object would narrow the field of the operation of these proposals. What did he mean by that? Surely, it pointed to the fact that, if not now, at some future time which he had in his mind, the scope of these proposals would be wider than possibly was contemplated by Members now listening to the discussion. But whether the Government had that in mind or not, he staked his reputation as a Parliamentary prophet that the Standing Order would be used more and more, and any quotations which might be made in the future of the intentions now expressed by Ministers would have no binding effect either upon them or upon other Ministers or the House of Commons as a whole. They would say, "No; we see the Standing Order; we look back to the Votes and Proceedings; we see that the House declined to exclude these Bills from the ordinary procedure of sending them upstairs; we see nothing inconsistent or improper in sending them upstairs." And they would send them upstairs. That suited the Party opposite for the moment; a little while ago it would have suited those on his own side of the House extremely well; some time hence it might suit them extremely well again. He made his protest against the action of the Government, but he and his friends reserved to themselves the right, when their time came, to use freely the weapons which the Government were forging.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) said the right hon. Gentleman who had answered for the Government and opposed the Amendment, had tried to put them off by saying that departmental Bills under this Amendment would not be able to go upstairs, which was obviously the place for them. He had anticipated that they would have a more or less thin argument on behalf of the Government against this proposition, but he had not thought that it would bear so little investigation. It did not stand even a moment's criticism, because the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had shown very clearly that the Bills to which allusion had been made did not in any way modify or take away any power of the Crown. If he had not been able to show that, he had intended to suggest that the word "power" should be altered to the word "prerogatives," which he thought would convey the idea which his hon. friend the Member for the City of London, in moving this Amendment, set forth. After all, the Amendment was one of considerable importance. He was not alluding to the departmental Bills referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. He was alluding to the great constitutional questions which, after all, happily for us, were seldom heard of in this country, but which, when they did occur, ought to receive the consideration of the Whole House, and not be relegated to any Committee upstairs. While it was perfectly true that the Committee upstairs represented Parties in the proportion which obtained in the House, yet they knew that forty could do against 400 what four could not do against forty. There could be no doubt that if the Opposition was small in number in Committee of the Whole House, it was still weaker in Committee upstairs than would be expected from the actual proportions. He had had experience of that during the short period he had been in Parliament. In Committee on the Land Tenure Bill they were in a very small minority, although the same proportion was maintained between Parties as in the House. What was the result? They moved Amendment after Amendment; those Amendments were received with considerable contempt upstairs; but when they came down to the House, and they had with them the Leader of the Opposition, and the assistance of their friends on that side of the House, who could enforce the views which they had expressed upstairs, a good many of those Amendments were carried. That only showed the importance to the Opposition of having measures which they considered of the utmost importance discussed by the Whole House, and not relegated to a Committee upstairs, as was suggested. He did not think that the Minister for Education would have hesitated to accept this Amendment, which was obviously a sensible one, had it not been that the Prime Minister had made the rash statement the other day that the Government was not prepared to add any Bills to those already exempt from the Standing Order. He could only hope that the Prime Minister and the Government would reconsider that decision. If they put down certain Bills as exceptions to the ordinary course of procedure, he thought the lawyers would bear him out when he said that, ipso facto, every other Bill would be considered as not to be kept on the floor of the House. Therefore, when a private Member moved that a particular Bill should be referred to Committee of the Whole House, this Standing Order would be immediately quoted against him; it would be held that, because a particular Bill was not among the class specified as those which were to be referred to Committee of the Whole House, it was intended, when the Standing Order was passed, that it should not be so referred, but should go upstairs.

Mr T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.) said it was now obvious why the Government had so long delayed their threatened proceedings against the House of Lords. They had been waiting for this new process of secret Committees, where they could effect unreported revolutions. That ought to make the Opposition all the more vigilant in watching in order to see that no power was taken from the House of scrutinising carefully any of the revolutionary proposals made by friends of the Government and afterwards accepted by the Government. If the House had any sense of justice and fair play left it would accept an Amendment which would keep these vital matters under the control of the House and not allow vital questions to pass to secret Committees upstairs, where the proceedings were not reported, where the Government was sure of an overwhelming majority, and where their nefarious doings were not made known to the public.

Mr. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) appealed to the Government to accept the Amendment, which would really improve their powers as a Legislative Assembly. It was of vital importance that important Bills affecting or interesting the public should be threshed out in Committee of the Whole House. What happened on the Report stage was comparatively immaterial. The question for the House to consider was whether by relegating important measures to a Committee they would turn out better or worse work. As a lawyer he had had the advantage of seeing the way in which law was made in the House last year, and he had been struck with the great advantage of the Committee stage of important measures over the Report stage. In discussions which were reported the public saw points at once which hon. Members did not see, and which even the sharpest of them had not noticed. He might mention the case of the Workmen's Compensation Bill of last year, where, on the Report stage, they had to discuss a number of very important matters afresh. They only needed to read the conundrums which were being put to legal gentlemen in the Press upon the Workmen's Compensation Bill to realise the confusion which resulted from legislating in that way. Surely, when dealing with questions upon which public criticism was useful and vital, such as the powers of the Houses of Parliament or the Crown, it was advisable that they should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. The minority was practically powerless upstairs, and their criticisms would have little effect there, but the same criticisms might have the greatest possible effect if made in the House, where they were reported. He submitted it would be better for the House generally if more Bills were exempted from this strong and drastic proposition.

Mr. DALZIEL thought the hon. Member opposite was unnecessarily alarmed about the future, so far as the proposals of the Government were concerned. He was afraid the hon. Member could not have been present when the announcement was made that in future they were to have in the House a Committee stage on all Bills which went upstairs.

Mr. RAWLINSON asked, if that was so, was there any guarantee that every Bill of the nature they were discussing would go to a Committee upstairs and would then be dealt with by the House in Committee as well as on the Report stage?

Mr. DALZIEL said the hon. and learned Member must not ask the Government to go too far. He thought they had already killed their own scheme by accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Dublin University. There was no fear now that in future legislation would proceed at a more rapid rate.

*Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I do not think this matter ought to be discussed now. It had better be discussed when the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman is moved.

Mr. DALZIEL said he could assure the hon. Member that there would be greater safeguards under the new Rule than there were at the present time.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) said there could be no doubt that discussions on important Bills in Committee of the Whole House, being reported in the Press, had an educative effect on the knowledge, opinion, and feeling of the country. From that point of view these new procedure proposals were of a destructive character. He understood that every Bill would automatically go upstairs to Committees where reports would not be made of the discussions. The result would be that the country would not be informed of what was being done. What took place on the Committee Stage of a Bill downstairs was often extremely instructive to the Government, the Opposition, and the country. Very often even the Minister in charge did not really understand the entire purport of the clauses of his Bill until it was brought home to him in the discussion in Committee, and if they lost the effect of that discussion in Committee of the Whole House in the case of important Bills, the House and the country would lose a great deal. The gainers would be the members of the legal profession, who would have complicated questions presented to the Courts on which they would argue with abundant ingenuity and fertility of resource to their own advantage, but not to the advantage of the administrative departments of the Government. Moreover, it would be possible, under the new rules, for a measure touching the relations between the two Houses, or affecting the prerogatives of the Crown, to be carried through Committee upstairs, with the aid of the closure, without the country being informed of what had happened until the Bill returned to the House on the Report stage. He understood that the Government contemplated some concession in regard to the Report stage, allowing Members to speak more than once, but that would not be equivalent to the full discussion in Committee of the Whole House. To expedite business, it would be better to proceed on the lines of somewhat curtailing the Report stage, leaving the Committee discussion as a means of fully informing the country upon the details of a Bill.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) expressed regret at the attitude of the Government on this question. In old times, when it was the custom to send non-controversial Bills to Standing Committees, the system succeeded, but, when that custom was departed from, those Committees failed, as he was afraid they would under the conditions now proposed. There were many Bills closely affecting social life and religious sensibilities which should have all the publicity that attached to discussions in the House. Speeches of the greatest interest were made in Committee, but never reached the public. The temper in Committee was different from that in the House. There was a feeling of haste and of limitation in point of time, and, what was very important, there was little assistance from members of the legal profession. It was on the members of that profession that they must largely rely for the interpretation of the law. He ventured to say that many of the Bills which had been sent to the Standing Committees would not have become law but for the assistance given by legal gentlemen. They had had this session most interesting discussions in the Standing Committees, and he believed that the passage of the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill would have been impossible without the assistance of the legal Gentlemen.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said he thought the hon. Baronet was speaking rather too generally on this matter. The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill had no connection with the Amendment before the House.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL said he felt sure that the House would act wisely in exercising the greatest caution in sending these Bills to Standing Committees.

SIR E. CARSON thought that at least the ordinary courtesies of Parliamentary life entitled the Opposition to some answer from the Government to the arguments put forward from that side of the House. He knew that the Opposition were small in number, but he did not think it was in the least necessary that the Government should be always proclaiming their contempt for minorities. Since the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education had addressed the House, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Members had raised important matters in regard to the question now under discussion; but the only answer given from the Government Benches was the ordinary look of contempt to which they were now becoming accustomed. [MINISTERIAL laughter.] That might seem to some hon. Members a matter for joke, but he could assure them that with five years' experience as a Member of the late Government, he had never found it in the least conducive to his own happiness or to the despatch of public business in the House, to treat minorities with contempt or to refuse to answer their arguments. Personally, he did not look upon the new Rules of Procedure, and this Rule in particular, with any grave anxiety; but he saw in them a good opportunity for others more enthusiastic than himself in Parliamentary tactics, not to forward but to obstruct the business of the House. That was not a course which he himself would care to adopt. [MINISTERIAL laughter.] He did not see why hon. Gentleman should laugh. He was entitled as a Member with fourteen years experience of the House, and as one who had contributed from time to time such ability as he possessed in his profession in trying to assist the passage of good legislation, to put forward the views which he held on this occasion. It was perhaps because he was an Irishman that he could not help being amused that the Government proposed, by this new Rule, to send upstairs, without a moment's discussion, Bills affecting the Constitution of the country, the prerogatives of the Crown, and the relations between the Houses of Parliament, and yet excepted from the Rule Provisional Orders in regard to the electrical supply of a district or to drains. He thought that that really reduced the Rule to an absurdity. He believed that when the Government had passed these Rules and thereby stifled discussion in the House at a stage upon which it was most important that the House and the country should learn the real meaning of their Bills, so far from facilitating legislation Bills would be discussed upstairs day after day, not upon their merits or with the object of improving them, but because hon. Members would feel that, being deprived of the power of considering them in the House itself, they ought to do all in their power to defeat them. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh."] That might be an improper thing to do, but he would remind hon. Gentleman opposite that it was only two years since members of the Government were in Opposition and since the President of the Board of Education sat below the gangway on the Opposition side, and that the only reason they knew him at all at the time was that he was such an adept in obstructing Bills. Did the Government think that, because they possessed such a majority as rendered the minority almost powerless, they were going to set up some orthodox system of purity in relation to the conduct of Bills, and that they would never have to face tactics in which they themselves for many years had helped to educate the House? If they were determined to bring under their Rule such important questions as those which related to the prerogative of the Crown and to matters between the two Houses, as far as he could see their Rules would be foredoomed to absolute failure.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he never knew a more flagrant and conspicuous instance of political ingratitude than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He had occasion earlier in the evening to address himself to the consideration of an Amendment very much on the same lines as this, and he had said that they could not accept that Amendment, or any other Amendment in the same category; but he looked on the Front Bench opposite, and, always anxious to make friends with the mammon of unrighteousness, he selected the right hon. Gentleman as the Member whom it would be most expedient to conciliate, and said that, while all other Amendments of the kind were to be rejected, his Amendment he was prepared to accept. He had always been on good personal terms with the right hon. Gentleman, for he had always thought it safer to be on good terms with him. He thought that on this occasion he had conciliated the right hon. Gentleman, but he came into the House after a short absence and found him denouncing the Government in unmeasured terms because they would not accept this Amendment. He never expected his kindness to meet with such a return. It would require a number of microscopes and a very minute examination to discover whether Bills might not in some way affect the powers of the Crown or of either House of Parliament. If exceptions were to be made, they ought to be more definite and easily ascertainable; but they were not supposed to make exceptions. The right hon. Gentleman's observations were founded on the mistake that underlay the whole attitude of the Party opposite—they thought these Rules would diminish the power of the House. He believed they would increase the power of the House. At present the House was hampered in carrying on the work of legislation, and the Government were endeavouring to expedite legislation and to make the examination of Bills which were to become law as thorough and as complete as possible. They thought that was to be done by consideration, deliberately and quietly, in Committees rather than in Committee of the Whole House. He had already said that the Government would enlarge the liberties and privileges of Members on the Report stage, to make up for the curtailment of the Committee stage, and yet the right hon. Gentleman made this terrible attack upon their scheme and anticipated evils which could not arise. They could not accept this Amendment or any other Amendment of the same kind. They were not prepared to admit any exception but that of financial Bills. The Hartington Committee on Procedure in 1886 expressed the view that every public Bill after the Second Reading, except a Bill originating in Ways and Means or confirming a Provisional Order should, unless the House otherwise ordered, be referred to a Standing Committee. The Government were now reviving that proposal. He believed it would accelerate business, and not produce any of the ill-effects which the right hon. Gentleman anticipated.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had accused his right hon. friend near him of ingratitude, because, although the right hon. Gentleman had accepted one of his right hon. friend's Amendments, the latter found something to criticise in another part of the Resolution. Whether that was a proper accusation to make he did not know, but at all events the Prime Minister could not accuse him of ingratitude, because he had made no concession to him and he might criticise this proposal without coming under the moral animadversions of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by making reference to the Report of the Hartington Committee of 1886. As to that, he had two observations to make. The first was that it must be remembered that the distinguished members of the Hartington Committee had the opportunity after 1886 of carrying their proposals into effect. They all had alterations to propose in the Rules of the House, and took part in debate on the Rules of the House, but none of them revived the proposals of 1886. The list of names of the members of the Committee of 1886 included that of the Chancellor of the Duchy and those of the great bulk of Parliamentary authorities, and they carried great weight. But those authorities by their subsequent action showed that they did not believe in their own prescriptions.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: You were the Leader of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not the whole time since 1886. The right hon. Gentleman had forgotten the Government of which he was so distinguished a member, when he and Sir William Harcourt and many other distinguished members of that Committee were in the Cabinet. The second observation he had to make was that the Government were not reviving the proposals of that Committee, who suggested that the House should be divided into four Grand Committees, and that those Committees should do their work in the hours in which the House now sat. There was something to be said in favour of that proposal. The Members of the Grand Committees which the Government proposed would have an amount of work which would prevent them from doing efficiently both their work in Committee in the morning and their work in the in the House in the afternoon. Therefore for these two reasons he did not think they ought to hear anything more of the Report of the Committee of 1886. He had only one more reason to urge, and it related to the main subject of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. What was his argument? His argument was that the House would carry out its legislative duties more efficiently if it first discussed the details of a Bill in Committee upstairs, and then dealt with them on the Report stage, which was now to be so modified as to be absolutely indistinguishable from the Committee stage except in so far that at that stage it would not be competent to discuss questions of finance. If the argument of the Prime Minister amounted to anything, it amounted to this, that the business would be better dealt with on this principle than on the present principle; that discussion upstairs would be in a calm atmosphere and that the Bill would be quietly and comfortably dealt with; and that it would be less quiet and comfortable in the House in which it was to find its final perfection. If that argument had any value at all it indicated that every Bill should go upstairs. Was that the view of the Government? It was plainly not the view of the Government, whether the view of the Government was regarded from the point of view of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman or of his Rule, because the right hon. Gentleman said that whenever there were any big financial proposals in a Bill that Bill should be kept in the House. Why should financial proposals be less efficiently dealt with in the quiet and comfortable atmosphere of a Committee upstairs? If it were a better method of dealing with legislation let it be applied to all Bills. Why was the Budget to be excepted? If anything ought to be discussed quietly and comfortably, surely it was the Budget. Why was that to be excepted? Everyone knew the reason. The real reason was that in the opinion of the Government Bills of really vital importance touching the interests of the country ought to be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. Therefore the Prime Minister's argument fell to the ground. Why was the most important business to be kept in the House if the better method of dealing with Bills was first to discuss them upstairs and then on the Report stage in the House? The more important a Bill was the more careful they should be to apply to it the most perfect instrument of legislation. The most important measures were going to be kept in the House. That was a proof that they were going to use an imperfect instrument in dealing with the great mass of legislation.

Tellers for the Noes.—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

Sir F. BANBURY then moved to exempt from the operation of the proposed Standing Order "Bills dealing with the organisation of the Army or Reserve Forces, or with the Navy." He did not suppose that any argument that he could adduce would persuade the Government to accept the Amendment. The Prime Minister had already told them that with the exception of an Amendment which stood in the name of his right hon. friend the Member for the University of Dublin, he did not propose to accept any Amendments. Therefore he did not think that any arguments that he might be able to adduce would be likely to move him. It could not be contended that the Army was a question which was only interesting to a part of the House, because it was undoubtedly a subject of interest not only to the whole of the House but to the whole nation. The different sections of the House held different views and opinions upon the Army. He would like for a moment to point out the position hon. Members below the Gangway would be in if his Amendment was not accepted. In the event of this Rule being carried, all questions relating to the Army would go before one of these Grand Committees, and hon. Members below the Gangway would not be able to criticise them. The Committee of Selection had to appoint either sixty or eighty Members according to the representation of Parties in the House. There were two Parties sitting opposite. It was true they were all called Liberals, but one section were Liberal Imperialists, and the other were ordinary Liberals. These Grand Committees would not be selected with the idea of considering any particular subject, but they would be constituted at the commencement of the session. If on one of those Committees there happened to be a majority of Liberal Imperialists they might on some questions join with the Members of the Opposition and the Labour Members might find themselves out-voted. It was certain that a Committee chosen to serve a variety of objects would not reflect the real opinion of the House upon such questions as Army Reform and other matters affecting the Army. He did not think it was very likely that in the near future they would have to deal with very serious questions affecting the Army, and therefore it could not be argued that the acceptance of his Amendment would interfere with the conduct of the general business of the House. His proposal would provide that any measures affecting the Army should be dealt with in Committee of the Whole House. Nobody would deny that the Army was a vital necessity to the country. What would they gain by having such questions discussed upstairs? Why should he be deprived of listening to the arguments of hon. Members below the Gangway on Army matters? He would not have any opportunity of knowing what they said upstairs, because Hansard would not report them. He felt sure that, after mature consideration, the right hon. Gentleman would agree that at any rate they ought to ensure that matters relating to the Army should receive proper consideration. With regard to the Navy the force of his argument was much greater. There were rarely any questions in regard to the Navy likely to occupy much time, and he hoped hon. Members would be given every opportunity of expressing their views upon naval matters which everybody regarded as the most important that could be brought before the attention of Parliament and the country. The Navy was our first line of defence and the discussion of naval matters ought not to be relegated to a comfortable and quiet Chamber upstairs, to be dealt with by some sixty or eighty Members, where the country would not know what was being done. This was a most important Amendment. It dealt with the whole safety of the country. When he remembered what took place a few years ago when the country was in a difficult position he trembled to think what might be the result if our defences were to be left to the tender mercies of sixty or seventy Members chosen, one did not really know how, deliberating in a quiet manner in a Chamber upstairs where the proceedings were unreported.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) seconded the Amendment. He said it was not proposed that there should be a Service Committee, and yet Bills dealing with military and naval affairs would be referred to one or another of the four Standing Committees, though the Committee was appointed without regard to military or naval matters. It might have no military or naval representative on it at all. On the other hand, the Committee might have a predominant military or naval representation, and no Labour or trade union representative. He did not think hon. Members below the Gangway would like to have military and naval matters settled upstairs without their having a voice in the discussion of the details. From whatever point of view they looked at it it was desirable that these matters should be dealt with by a Committee of the whole House, unless a special Service Committee was appointed. If these Procedure Rules were passed, the Territorial and Reserve Forces Bill could be referred to one of the Committees, and he did not think any of the Committees was fit to deal with a Bill changing the whole of our military system. Looking a little further ahead, let them assume that the Territorial and Reserve Forces Bill was a failure—he hoped it would not be—they would be face to face with the question whether they could go on with the voluntary system or not. He thought most people admitted that if the scheme failed, this country must go in for a compulsory system. [AN HON. MEMBER: "No."] Were the details of a system of conscription, or compulsory service, to be dealt with by the Standing Committee on Law, or the Standing Committee on Trade, sitting almost in camera—for there was no official report of the proceedings? These matters were far too important to be decided in a slipshod manner by a Committee upstairs. The same argument applied in regard to matters relating to the Navy. It was manifestly desirable that the deliberations of the House, or any part of the House, should have the greatest possible publicity, and that they should not be confined to a small body selected without any reference whatever to their ability to discuss great questions of Imperial importance.

"In line 10, at end, to add, (c) 'Bills dealing with the organisation of the Army or Reserve forces, or with the Navy.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) said he was sorry they had had no reply vouchsafed them by the Government. He was in hearty sympathy with the Amendment, in favour of which the mover and seconder had put forward sound arguments. There were two grounds on which the Amendment ought to be accepted by the Government.

The first was that measures which dealt with questions of Imperial and National importance ought to be reserved for discussion by the Whole House. The second was that questions dealing with the maintenance of the Army and Navy, in which the electors of the country were most keenly interested, should also be reserved for consideration by the Whole House. That was forcibly brought to the attention of the House on the previous evening by the hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs, who told them that he had been travelling about in his constituency, and had found that his constituents took the keenest interest in the Territorial Army Bill and that he thought it was his duty, as a supporter of the Government, to tell them what was the opinion of his constituents on that measure. He was sure that all the Members on the Opposition side of the House felt most strongly that any Bills dealing with the reorganisation of the Army or Navy ought to receive the fullest discussion in the House of Commons where that discussion could be fully reported in the newspapers. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had said that the Government were entirely in agreement with the argument that the House of Commons should have complete control over expenditure; but that could only be secured by discussing the administration of the Naval and Military Forces of the country in Committee of the Whole House. The Secretary for War, in introducing his Army Bill, had told them that the efficiency of the Auxiliary Forces would by it be materially improved, and that the expense of maintaining the Militia and Volunteers would be materially reduced. He submitted that the country would be unable to understand how the efficiency of those Forces could be maintained or improved unless the subject was discussed fully in Committee of the Whole House.

Captain CRAIG (Down. E.) recognised that far-reaching changes in procedure were being proposed by the Government, and it did not require one with very long practice of the House to see that if the Rule now under discussion was carried in its entirety a large amount of the influence of private Members would be taken away. As one who had taken the deepest interest in the Army and Navy, he objected to Bills dealing with those Services being sent to a Committee upstairs. It would be a great loss to Scottish and Irish Members if they could not serve on the Committees which dealt with the affairs of their respective countries. Then, again, he looked forward with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the Territorial Forces Bill in Committee of the Whole House. The details of that scheme were being considered very carefully and cautiously, not alone by Members of the House, but by their advisers outside. They wished to assist the right hon. Gentleman in his scheme, but many of them might be prevented from bringing forward their ideas or those of the people who were assisting them, and in that case would be unable to assist the Secretary of State. No doubt the Committees were appointed fairly, but what the Secretary of State wanted was the true reflection of the feelings of the whole country. One able and energetic Member might possibly focus the aspirations and ideas of a large number of Members of the House, but he did not think that would carry so much weight as if the views of members of the different branches of the Service were heard. He could not conceive a more reasonable Amendment than that before the House, and he was convinced that if it was accepted the time of the House would in the long run be saved. If a private Member was burning with ardour to have his views expressed on some great subject in connection with the Army and Navy, the fact that the Committee had dealt with the matter would not prevent its being discussed at a greater length upon the Report stage than it would have been in Committee. If the Amendment were accepted it would tend to shorten debates in the House.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that what had happened in the last half hour sufficiently showed the necessity of some step's being taken to enable the House to deal with this matter, and to enable the Government to bring to a successful issue the scheme of procedure which they had brought before the House. He intended not the slightest discourtesy to hon. Members opposite when he said that it was idle to expect him or his friends to answer in detail each one of these Amendments. It was perfectly clear what their object was. He had said from the first and repeated again and again, and given the reasons for his decision, that the Government could not possibly accept any Amendments of this kind. That being so, it seemed to be a misuse of Parliamentary time to go on proposing them and using any arguments that might be found to support them. What the Government proposed to do was to put down to-morrow a scheme of time-limit for the further discussion of these Rules, which scheme would be moved on Monday, the eleven o'clock rule being suspended for its discussion. The timing of the scheme, the appropriation of the time of the House, would be such as to bring the whole debate on the new Rules of Procedure to a close on Tuesday night. [AN HON. MEMBER: On Monday?] No, they must get the resolution first on Monday, and put it into practice on Tuesday. He therefore begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said they had a new Motion before the House supported by a speech with which he, at any rate, found it impossible to agree. The Prime Minister had said that it was idle to expect that he or any of the Gentlemen who so ably assisted him could answer their Amendments in detail.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I referred to this particular series of Amendments.

MR. WYNDHAM said that if the right hon. Gentleman had not precluded him from dealing with the Amendment now before the House, and making a suggestion which even the right hon. Gentleman might at any rate have considered, he would have been in order in discussing the Amendment; but he had now to deal with the situation which the right hon. Gentleman had created by saying that it was impossible for them to expect him or any of his colleagues to deal with the Amendments in detail. Presumably that observation had some particular bearing on the Amendment before the House. The Prime Minister swept all those Amendments into one category, and called them "Amendments of that character." Might they not retort that it was impossible for them to understand the position of the Government over this Amendment? The Chancellor of the Duchy had given it as his opinion that the Bill which was in the mind of all those who supported the Amendment, namely, the Bill affecting the Territorial Forces of the country, was not a Bill which ought to go upstairs. That was the view of the Chancellor of the Duchy.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: I never said that.

MR. WYNDHAM said that in that case there was a misunderstanding between them, because certainly on that side of the House it was understood that the Chancellor of the Duchy said that the Bill introduced drastic changes into the organisation of the forces of the Crown, and was bound to modify the financial control of the House in respect of the Forces of the Crown, and they understood him to mean that a Bill of that character ought not to go upstairs. That was what they understood, and it would have shortened the debate on the Amendment if they had been allowed to remain in the belief that that was the view of the Government. But they were not allowed to remain in that belief. Another Minister of Cabinet rank, the Minister for Education, once Financial Secretary, and therefore a special authority on the control of the House of Commons over finance, had spoken, and he again must have been misunderstood by them, but he had certainly left the impression on them that that was a Bill which ought to go upstairs. And then the Prime Minister, who was a man of the world as well as a Minister, and who always believed in the easy middle course, intervened. One Minister had suggested that the Bill should go upstairs, and the other Minister had suggested that it ought not to go upstairs. Between the two, the Prime Minister conveyed to their mind the idea that some of the Bill should go upstairs, and that some of it ought to be retained in the House. That being the case, was it fitting that the Prime Minister should twit and taunt them with bringing forward Amendments which the Government could not understand. The reason they had persisted with these Amendments was that they might understand the view of the Government upon what they thought was a fundamental principle of the Constitution, namely, that the House should retain control over the finance which affected the military forces of the Crown. The Prime Minister had been at the War Office, he had been an orthodox War Minister, and he had ever stipulated for the financial control of the House over the forces of the Crown; but now he came down at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock and said that he did not understand the Opposition. He was not only prepared to terminate the debate on the Amendment, but he shut out discussion upon a matter of so much importance. The sub-section at the beginning of Clause 3 was so important that he might venture to read it—

> "The Army Council shall pay to an association out of money voted by Parliament for Army services such sums as in the opinion of the Army Council are required to meet the necessary expenditure connected with the exercise and discharge by the association of its powers and duties."

That was printed in italics and would be kept in the House. But in Clause 2, which preceded that sub-section and which was to be allowed to be discussed upstairs, there were provisions for spending money for the provision and maintenance of rifle ranges, buildings, magazines, sites of camps for the Territorial Force, establishing and maintaining or fostering and encouraging cadet battalions and corps, and rifle corps, the provision of horses for the peace requirements, and other matters entailing the expenditure of hundreds and thousands of pounds. All these matters were not printed in italics. Earlier in the afternoon the Government denounced and derided an Amendment brought in by a private Member, and said it was practically impossible to discuss a clause in italics downstairs and the rest of the Bill upstairs. Here was one of the principal measures of the session, involving a high expenditure, of which, if this rule was passed, four lines in italics could be discussed as an isolated item downstairs and the rest would be discussed upstairs. The inconsistency of the Government beggared description. The right hon. Gentleman had led the House to believe that part of a Bill could be discussed downstairs and part upstairs. But when the right hon. Gentleman told them the only part to be discussed downstairs was the part in italics, and when the part in italics came after all the provisions to transfer from the House all the powers of the purse, then they had reached the point of farce, and there was no justification for the proposal the right hon. Gentleman had just made.

MR. DALZIEL appealed to the Prime Minister to provide, in his limit of time for the discussion of the Rule, some opportunity to the private members to state their views. He expressed the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would not assume that because the two front benches were agreed, the whole of the House was agreed on the principle of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University. At present, if a private Member was early in the ballot and got his Bill through a Grand Committee he had a chance with the present Report stage of getting the Bill passed into law. But under the scheme before the House, having got his Bill through the Grand Committee, he would have to face all the dangers of what was practically a new Committee stage in the House, with the result that in the press of business at the end of the session, he would never get his Bill passed. He therefore begged the Government to give the House an opportunity of considering the Amendment, before they fixed a limit for ending the discussion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: called attention to the importance of the statement made by the Prime Minister in moving the adjournment of the debate and its effect upon the arguments with which the Government bench had hitherto met all the Amendments moved from the Opposition side of the House. It had always been objected to the Amendments moved from that side of the House either that they would exclude from the purview of the Grand Committee trivial measures which should go there, or that it was unnecessary to exclude grave matters because they might always trust to the sense of fairness of the Government of the day and to their desire that adequate discussion should be given to any great changes that might be proposed. They were discussing changes the extent of which the Government had made no attempt to minimise; in fact they prided themselves upon their magnitude. They were changes not in regard to any particular subject, but which affected their procedure in regard to every subject and every Bill. What did the sense of fairness in which they were told to put their trust lead the Government to do? It led the Prime Minister to come down to the House at half-past eleven o'clock with the announcement that he would bring forward a proposal which would stop all debate on his Resolutions the next day. That was an illustration of how little faith could be placed in any Government. He did not make that as a special charge against this Government, although he thought they had pressed their powers to an extent unknown in the history of Parliament. He did not think any hon. Member who sat in the last Parliament would deny that statement. [Cries of "Yes" and "the Member for Rushcliffe."] He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe would deny the statement he had made.

MR. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said he traversed the statement entirely.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said the late Government proposed Amendments to the Rules of the House which were fought with great persistency by hon. Gentlemen opposite, including the Prime Minister. How many days were given? They had had three days on the present Rules, and they were promised one day more. The late Government gave seventeen days. As three were to seventeen so were the whips with which the late Government scourged the then Opposition to the scorpions applied by the present Government to their opponents.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: We have been three days over seven lines.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN asked what that had to do with the matter. A skilful draftsman could put a great deal into seven lines, and especially the first seven lines. The time spent on Bills must be measured by the importance of the subject discussed. Could the time spent on the Agricultural Holdings Bill or the Plural Voting Bill of last year be measured by the number of lines in the Bills as originally introduced? Let hon Gentlemen opposite read the number of lines inserted in those Bills, not because the Government thought they were necessary in the first place, but because they were proved to be necessary the moment the questions were discussed. He would repeat his statement that the Government were using the power of their majority in a way unknown in the history of Parliament, and he would invite the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe to justify his contradiction. The right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench were going to sit on the Opposition Benches. ["When?"] Perhaps a great deal sooner than some hon. Members of the House imagined. The Government were now forging new weapons for their own purposes. He thought these changes were injurious to the House of Commons, but if the present majority insisted on making them, they would be used by their opponents when their day came. Those who were now sitting on the Ministerial Benches would then stew in the juice which they had served out to their political opponents.

Question put.

Temporary Employment of Women Telegraphists in the Post Office.

MR. THORNE (West Ham, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the Post Office authorities have advertised in the public press for applicants for certain positions, which, upon investigation, show that women are required to live in London and seaside towns during the summer months, and work in telegraph offices for £1 per week; whether he is aware that at the end of the summer they are to be dismissed and have to look for work at other places; whether he is aware that the wages named are far below the wages paid to women telegraphists in permanent employment; and whether, bearing in mind that casual employment at low wages intensifies the unemployment difficulty, he will discourage the practice.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The object of obtaining temporary assistance is simply to relieve the pressure, which cannot unfortunately be avoided in the summer months, and which is partly due to the natural increase of the work in that district and partly to the absence of a considerable portion of the staff on annual leave, which the Post Office endeavours to give, as far as possible, during the summer months. This pressure cannot be altogether met by permanent additions to the staff without great waste of force and money during the rest of the year. It is met partly by overtime; and it is my desire, as far as possible, to reduce excessive overtime and consequent pressure on the staff. The employment of temporary assistants is one of several expedients designed with that object which have been under consideration. It is only in the small country towns, where living is cheap, that wages of 20s. are offered to women telegraphists.

Leadless Glaze in Government Buildings.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the First Commissioner of Works how far the suggestions made by him to various public departments as to the desirability of using leadless glaze since 26th July last have led to satisfactory results; and how far other refreshment committees of Government offices are prepared to take action similar to that of the Home Office, Paymaster-General, Royal Mint, Royal Courts of Justice, and the General Post Office and its principal branches, such as Edinburgh, Manchester, etc.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) I have ascertained that all the departments communicated with have adopted, or decided to adopt, the china and earthenware glaze established as the standard by the Office of Works. The British Museum authorities have not yet taken the same course, owing (I understand) to special difficulties connected with the supply of refreshments there being in the hands of private contractors. The departments have been furnished with all necessary information as to the articles which the Office of Works uses, and as to the prices at which they can be obtained. Arrangements have also been made with the Office of Works' contractors to supply articles to these departments, on their request, at the rates in the contracts with my office.

Education Grants and Rates in Scotland.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can state the total amount obtained in the last financial year in Scotland for the purposes of education, including the Parliamentary grants and local rates, and the cost per head of the population as estimated in 1905.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The amount expended out of Parliamentary grants for the financial year ended 31st March, 1907, was approximately £1,970,730, and the rate per head of population, as estimated in 1905, was 8s. 5¼d. The amount raised out of local rates for the year ended Whit Sunday, 1906, was approximately £1,223,760, and the rate per head was 5s. 3¼d. But, on the whole subject, I cannot do better than to refer my hon. friend to the Return relating to Education in the United Kingdom, numbered 305, and dated 2nd August, 1906, which gives full particulars for the year 1904–5.

Expenditure on Police in Scotland.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can state the total amount received and expended by local authorities in Scotland on police, including grants from Local Taxation Account, and the rate per head of the population of Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The cost of police services in Scotland, part of which is defrayed from grants from the Local Taxation Account, for the year 1906, amounted to £573,348, excluding pensions, being at the rate of 2s. 5½d. per head of estimated population.

Scottish Churches Commission Awards.

Sir ARTHUR BIGNOLD (Wick Burghs): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in the case of a property awarded by the Churches Commission to either of the two churches concerned, such property not being required by the church to which it has been awarded and thereupon sold by that church, the proceeds of the sale will then be subject to subsequent disposal by the Commission, or if such proceeds will fall into the funds of the denomination to which the award was made.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) I am advised that the point raised by the hon. Member is really a question of the legal construction of the Act, but I understand that the function of the Commission is to allocate the congregational property between the churches, and so soon as the allocation is completed the future disposal of the property is altogether outside their jurisdiction.

Expenditure on Education in England and Wales.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether he can state approximately the total of contributions from local authorities in England and Wales to education in the last financial year; and, having regard to the fact that £12,726,000 is stated by the Treasury to be the net amount charged on the Votes of Parliament for the Board of Education in England, can he state the total cost of education in the last financial year, and the rate per head of the population as estimated in 1905.

(Answered by Mr. Lough.) No reliable figures are available as regards local authorities' expenditure on education in England and Wales in the financial year which ended ten days ago. It has been estimated that the total expenditure from public funds on elementary education during that period would be about £21,323,274, of which £11,022,600 would be met from Exchequer grants, and £10,300,674 from local sources, which, in some cases, may include receipts from endowments and from fees. In respect of education other than elementary the corresponding figures are estimated as £3,040,964, £1,556,488 (including sums from the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Residue Account), and £1,484,476 respectively, but these figures are not reliable, and they do not, of course, include all public expenditure upon education of all grades in England and Wales, still less the "total cost of education," which the hon. Member asks for. For this reason it is impossible to state the rate per head of the estimated population.

Population of England and Wales and Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the fact that the population of Ireland has decreased from 8,175,124 in 1841 to 4,387,887 on 30th June, 1906, he can state, for purposes of comparison, the population of England and of Wales, respectively, in 1841, and the estimated population of England and of Wales, respectively, in 1906.

	Persons.
England - - - -	14,997,427
Wales - - - - -	911,705
Persons travelling on railways and canals not apportioned to counties - - -	5,016

Estimated to the middle of 1906.

Expenditure by Boards of Agriculture in England and Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the official statement that the aggregate amount voted by Parliament for the service of the Board of Agriculture for England and Wales for seven years from 1900–1 to 1906–7, inclusive, was £766,403, equivalent to 4·9d. per head of the population of 1901; and whether, for purposes of comparison, he can state the aggregate amount voted from all sources for the Department of Agriculture in Ireland during the same period, and the rate per head of the population of Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The aggregate amount voted by Parliament for the service of the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland for the seven years from 1900–1 to 1906–7, inclusive, was £1,198,502. This sum is equivalent to the amount which would be produced by an annual rate of a little over 9½d. per head of the estimated population of Ireland on 30th June, 1906, viz. 4,387,887. A comparison, however, cannot properly be drawn between this amount and the amount voted for the service of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. The amount voted to the Irish Department, as quoted, includes £185,000 which was borne on the Vote of the Department, but paid over to the Congested Districts Board. It also includes £280,581 in respect of the cost of the Royal College of Science, the Museum of Science and Art, the National Library of Ireland, the Metropolitan School of Art, the Royal Botanic Gardens, and the Geological Survey of Ireland; and it further includes £149,050, consisting of grants to schools of science and art and day secondary schools. No corresponding provisions are contained in the Vote for the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries except in respect of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew. In England the moneys voted for technical education and for the Geological Survey are administered not by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries but by the Board of Education. It is also to be borne in mind that a considerable portion of the funds administered by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland is furnished not by voted moneys but by the Department's Endowment Fund, as provided by section 15 of the Act establishing the Department.

Map Reading for Soldiers.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the subject of map reading has been omitted from the soldier's examination for a first-class certificate of education owing to the delay in the issue of notes on that subject; and if so, whether the issue of these notes can be expedited.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The manual of map reading in use was considered too advanced for non-commissioned officers and men, and some time has been spent in preparing a simpler work. It was thought desirable to hold over the examination in map reading until the new book was ready. This text book is now in the press, and will be issued to all concerned at the earliest possible date.

War Office Contracts in Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEGH: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state approximately the value of the contracts placed by the War Office with contractors in Ireland in the last financial year.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is not possible to give even an approximate estimate of the value of the contracts placed with contractors in Ireland without calling for Returns from every command. In each command it would be necessary to examine each contract. I do not think that the result obtained at the cost of an enormous amount of time and labour would be of sufficient value to render it justifiable to call for the Return.

COAL MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

*MR. WALSH (Lancashire, Ince) said that in moving the Second Reading of this Bill he was compelled to remember the fact that it had been for many years before the House. For nineteen years it had been presented as a distinct Bill for the limitation of the hours of labour in mines, coming before the House in that form in 1889, and for two years before that it took the form of the Amendment of measures which were before the House. It had, therefore, completed its twenty-first year. It had, in that sense, attained its majority, and he could only say that he wished now that the callow youth had developed into a strapping lusty man, that his fortunes had been on this occasion entrusted to abler hands than his. But there was satisfaction in knowing that, after all, the matter had never been looked upon as a purely Party question. The lines of Party division had never been sharply drawn in an acrimonious sense in the discussions in the House upon this matter, and therefore, while one's qualms might be great in having charge of the measure upon the Second Reading, yet they were certainly lessened, and the feeling of satisfaction was, if possible, increased by the fact that the measure had never been looked upon as one of a Party character. On many occasions it had passed its Second Reading, sometimes with small, sometimes with relatively large majorities, and on the last occasion the Second Reading was not challenged at all, and passed absolutely without any opposition being offered to it. There was almost entire agreement to the proposition that, provided no injury was inflicted upon the national prosperity, the coal miner, man and boy, had an overwhelming claim for a limitation of his hours of labour. What were the objections? The Mine Owners' Association of Great Britain had issued a brief on this occasion, as it had issued briefs on many other questions which had come before the House. In that brief it was stated, first of all, that if the measure were adopted there would be a diminution of output and a consequent increase of price to consumers, which it was said would seriously injure, if not cripple, many industries, and might even lead to ruin. The cry of ruin to British industry had been so often raised in that House that he thought it was losing a good deal of its potency. He did not mean to repeat the arguments that had been urged previously in the country and in the House as to the groundlessness of these alarms, but in order to prove the great and growing expansion of the coal producing industry he would put forward a few figures. He would take the years 1884 and 1906. In 1884, the output of coal was 161,000,000 tons, while in 1906 it had reached the astounding total of 251,000,000 tons, or an increase in about twenty years of nearly 57 per cent. But that was not the whole case. They had to take into account the productivity of the mines, notwithstanding the fact, which was not disputed, that many of the most easily worked mines were rapidly going out of existence. Easily worked mines and seams were rapidly disappearing, and mines were being worked at a greater depth and under very much more onerous conditions, and yet the productivity of the mines was increasing year by year. In the district with which he was specially concerned, the Liverpool and North Wales district, there had been a decrease of nearly 750 men employed in the course of the year, yet the production had risen by more than 1,500,000 tons. Thus while the people employed had fallen in numbers the tonnage had increased by more than 7½ per cent., and that in a district where the more easily worked mines were very rapidly indeed giving way. But he would take the nation as a whole. According to last year's returns the number of people employed had increased by 2¾ per cent., while the output had increased by 6¼ per cent., indeed nearly 6½ per cent. That showed that the productivity of man and boy, coupled with the enterprise of the employers in using modern science and invention and keeping pace with modern requirements, had been increased by both parties pulling together to meet existing needs. It was, however, still argued that ruin would overtake our great industries, even though they found that year after year throughout half a century the productivity of the mines had been increasing. This was not merely an ephemeral or transitory state of things. It embodied the experience of fifty years right away through. The employers carried their case a little further, and said that the increased bustle and hurry resulting from lessened hours would augment the risk and danger attendant upon mining operations and lead to a greater number of accidents. If that argument were sound it would follow that in those districts where shorter hours were worked there would be a greater percentage of danger as compared with those in which longer hours prevailed. What were the facts? In the county of Durham, where the shortest hours were worked, the accidents were in the ratio of one accident more or less serious per 63,000 tons of coal raised. In the district of Manchester and Ireland, where the longest hours were worked, the Government inspector reported that the working had reached a degree of safety which had never previously been accomplished, and the accidents were one for every 65,000 tons of coal raised, slightly in advance of the figures in regard to Durham, where the shortest hours were put in by the men. But when they came to the Swansea district, which in regard to length of hours was almost as bad as Manchester and Ireland, what were the figures? There they had a district where the hours were intolerably long, as the men worked ten, eleven and even a greater number of hours per day; there the proportion of accidents was one for every 32,500 tons of coal raised, or more than double the number of accidents in Durham where shorter hours were worked. If the long hours conduced to safety they would expect to find a greater degree of safety where long hours obtained than where shorter hours were worked. As a matter of fact, however, they found a greater ratio of accidents where the longer hours were worked. He had the honour of being on terms of friendship with the clerk and chief adviser of the Mine Owners' Association of Great Britain, Mr. T. R. Ellis, and that gentleman had pointed out that this Bill if carried would almost certainly reduce the percentage of coal got by fourteen per cent., or 32,000,000 tons. Those were terrifying figures, but when it was remembered that in last year alone the increase had been 15,000,000 tons, and that on many occasions it had been more than that, they came to the conclusion that Mr. Ellis wanted to make their flesh creep. But his flesh did not creep, and he did not think anyone else's would. Mr. Ellis, in his calculation, failed to make allowance for any increase of efficiency on the part of either work-people or employer, or for an improved attendance by the workmen resulting from the greater time they would have in which to renew their physical powers. No account was taken of the more efficient maintenance of the haulage and roadways, or of the increased output likely to result from the improvement of the human factors that were brought into the problem. All the argument of the employers was based upon the assumption that the maximum of working efficiency both of employer and of workman was attained, an assumption which the figures of half a century conclusively disproved. So far as to the objections of the employers. He would proceed to examine their admissions. Mr. Henry Bramall, a leading colliery agent and a man of great repute in the Manchester and Ireland district, speaking in regard to the pits where the longest hours of labour were worked, had pointed out that they were working at a depth in some of their mines of 1,170 or 1,200 yards, nearly three-quarters of a mile, and that the temperature was anything from 92 to 95 degrees. He had gone on to point out that some of the shafts were seven feet in diameter, and he seemed to think that the conditions appertaining to a shaft of that kind were to regulate the whole of the trade of the country. Mr. Robert Millington Knowles, the Chairman of Andrew Knowles and Company, Limited, speaking at the annual meeting two months ago, said that they had had to put down air-compressing plant to get the coal from the Pendlebury pits, where the depth was now so great that the temperature was too hot for horses to work in. It seemed that the conditions which rendered it impossible for horses to work were conditions in which it was perfectly possible and proper for human beings to labour. He did not think there could be any more scathing condemnation of the system under which mining operations had been conducted in many places than that statement by a representative of one of the firms who thought they had given such damaging evidence before the Departmental Committee. He thought the House would be inclined to pay more attention to the employers if they had ever tried to meet the case at all, but they had all along given an absolute non possumus, not merely to the Eight Hours Bill, but to every measure of social and industrial betterment. They had always raised this opposition and the cry that the industry would be ruined. Time after time had it been raised, but never once had the employers put forward any constructive policy. He had always honoured the Northumberland and Durham Coal Miners' Association, and he knew that the men who composed it were honest and honourable men. No doubt their opposition to this measure in the past had been founded upon weighty reasons and sincere motives, but they now knew that that position was not to continue, and that their friends in Northumberland were to stand on the side of the angels. [An HON. MEMBER: For a time.] At all events Northumberland was now with them. It might be said that there was a Departmental inquiry proceeding in regard to the matter, and that they should submit their case to it. [Hear, hear.] He heard cries of "hear, hear" from the front Opposition Bench, but in his judgment the stage of inquiry had long passed, because the evidence which was being laid before the Committee was evidence which had been known to every person acquainted with the ABC of the business for the last twenty years. Every schoolboy acquainted with coal mining matters knew that some pits were deeper than others; that some men had a little longer way to travel to the pit; that they did not all go down at once; that the distances underground varied so much that some were long and some were short, and he begged respectfully to point out that that was exactly the class of evidence which was being submitted to the Departmental Committee. It was given in a glorified form, of course, by gentlemen of repute and great commercial standing, but, as he had said, every schoolboy in coal mining knew all the facts that were being presented before the Committee. Seeing that the matter had been before the House for so many years, that it had been discussed openly, submitted to the electors and canvassed by the newspapers, it would be folly to say now that it ought to be referred to a Departmental Committee. What were the terms of reference to that Committee? They were directed to inquire into production, wages, employment, the export trade, and the effect on kindred industries, regard being had to the different conditions obtaining in different districts, as well as the probable effect of the proposed remedy on the health of miners; while if necessary the inquiry was to be extended to the case of metalliferous mines. That, surely, was a roving commission. Never did

Captain Kidd, in the course of his adventurous existence, embark on so broad a sea.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) pointed out that by the governing terms of reference the inquiry was limited to the probable economic effect of a limitation of employment to eight hours.

*MR. WALSH said that even so the inquiry might go on till the crack of doom, repeating platitudes to the end of the chapter, or collecting facts with which every one with any knowledge of the subject was already fully conversant. The attitude of the miners in regard to the inquiry reminded him of a story told of Sydney Smith. A friend imagined himself deeply in love with a young lady, and, undecided what to do, consulted the witty cleric. "My good fellow," was the reply, "you just do as you please; but, take my word for it, whatever you do you will live to regret it." Whatever the supporters of this Bill did they would live to regret it. If the miners gave evidence before the Committee they would be assisting in a vexatious and, as he believed, fatal delay. If they did not give evidence they would be told they were afraid to submit their case. But the case of the miners had been fully before the country for over twenty years. Their claim for a shorter day was based on the undoubted right of the workers to a fair share of the wealth they produced, and to a fair share of the leisure resulting from the increased productivity of their labour. If there was any section of the workers which had a prior claim to a shorter day, it was the miners who followed in the bowels of the earth an occupation that physically was most exhausting, under conditions as gloomy as it was possible for the mind of man to conceive. The advocates of a shorter working day said further, that if there was one section of miners who had a prior claim it was the youth of the mining population. For them it was absolutely necessary that they should have a shorter working day; it was absolutely necessary to give them some little brightness and hope while they were still young, if they were to develop that vigorous manhood upon which the forces of the nation rested. But the desire for mental improvement and intellectual progress was arrested if not absolutely stifled by reason of the long hours and onerous conditions under which they laboured. Millions of money were spent every year on education, but a large amount was wasted because technical and secondary education were rendered mere by-words by the conditions under which a large portion of our industrial population, and especially the miners, existed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover the other day told them that the standard of living was very often the standard of their self-esteem. No doubt it was because men would not be content with the conditions that prevailed twenty-five or thirty years ago that they had risen in their own self-esteem. It was in the hope that the House would help them in a work which could only have as its result the increasing prosperity of the country that he begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. E. EDWARDS (Hanley) seconded the Motion, agreeing with the mover that this was not a political question, as the measure was supported in all quarters of the House and the opposition to it was gradually vanishing. Everybody agreed that eight hours from bank to bank was quite long enough, and there could be no difficulty in proving that the nine or ten hours now worked were excessive in view of the atmospheric conditions under which miners laboured, and the dangerous nature of the occupation. Had there been anything like unity among the miners of the country the question would have been settled long ago; and once the question was disposed of the miners of north and south would be glad to shake hands. The opposition to the Bill was gradually declining. He might say it was now a question between employers and workmen, pure and simple, and he regretted that in all the negotiations that had taken place with the view of settling the problem of wages and the relationship between wages and prices the colliery owners had shown no desire to approach the miners' unions in order to discuss the question of the hours of labour. The cry had been raised that the adoption of an eight-hours day would ruin the coal industry. To that he replied that those in charge of the great mining organisations were fully alive to the needs of the country. In his judgment, there were no grounds for the statement that the proposed change would mean an enormous increase in the cost of production. He would not pin himself to a statement that there would be no increase of cost, for he believed the cost of production would be increased somewhat. It was asked why could they not get an eight hours day by trade union effort. He had the greatest admiration for the trade unions of the country, which had done much to improve the condition of the people—indeed, more than many were inclined to give them credit for. But were the trade unions, in face of the sheer and stupid opposition of the coalowners, to embark upon an effort to secure an eight hours day which would mean a strike that would put into the shade the appalling struggle of 1893? All who valued the interests of the working men of the country would go a long way to make impossible a strike of such magnitude, with all the disastrous consequences which would follow in its train. Trade unions might make the effort, but were they prepared to stand by and see repeated in tenfold intensity the events of 1893? They would rather trust to Parliament, which represented the wishes of the community, for the accomplishment of their object, than expose the interests of those for whom they spoke to the disastrous consequences of a strike. The great mass of workmen, on this question, sought to achieve their end by peaceful means, and by appeals to the reason and intelligence of the people. A strike was a clumsy method of settling such a question, and they preferred to ask the House to pass the Bill by such an overwhelming majority as would place its supporters in a better position than they could attain by means of a strike. Evidence had been given before the Departmental Committee which had inquired into the subject, and it might be accepted as true, from what they knew of the world and human nature, that a man was apt to take an exaggerated view of his own particular case. The workman had a most exaggerated view of the smallness of his wage, while the colliery manager had a most exaggerated view of the enormousness of that wage. One witness had stated that the effect of passing the measure would be to add to the cost of coal anything from between 3d. and 4d. to 2s. and 2s. 2d. per ton. But they need not be alarmed by that statement. They were not without experience on the point. When the Workmen's Compensation Bill was before the House it was urged that it would involve an increased cost of 4d. to 10d. a ton., but the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill was well advised in not accepting that statement, because experience had since shown that the extra cost was something like a penny per ton. or less. Applying their experience in regard to what it was said would cost 10d., and in reality cost only a penny, then, by the same rule, it might be accepted that what it was said would cost, say, one shilling under this Bill, would in reality cost a very small amount indeed. After all, the increase of cost caused by the Bill would be a very small matter indeed compared with the enormous increase of the value of coal which had been experienced during the last season. Still, if it were true that the institution of an eight-hours day would have the effect stated by colliery owners and managers, they would certainly pause before they went further with this Eight Hours Bill. The miners had no interest in passing any Bill which would close the collieries and throw them out of work. But the men who advocated the measure, with all the knowledge and experience they possessed, were fully satisfied that it would not have the disastrous consequences which were feared in certain quarters. He recalled the things which were said when the Act of 1872 came into operation. The owners threatened to retire from the trade, but they had remained in it long enough to make an enormous pile of money. He remembered that, in the district which he specially represented, when he was a boy the hours were eleven and twelve a day, and in those days the boys were rather worse treated than the men. The colliery owners and managers in the district to which he referred agreed to settle the question of the boys by establishing a uniform week of forty-eight hours—an eight-hours day for work in the colliery. That was done in 1872, in a district where the men worked eleven and twelve hours a day, and, as far as he knew, the arrangement had not interfered with the prosperity of the colliery owners. The predictions made as to the consequences which would attend the Bill now under discussion were very much opposed to experience, and he would rather take the facts which had been ascertained than rely on the assumption that the cost would be increased by from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per ton. During a long and arduous struggle the miners had been looking forward to the fulfilment of their hopes. No doubt their condition was better now than it was twenty or thirty years ago; still, their labour was of a description which justified their claiming that this Bill should be passed with unanimous assent. Surely, Members of the House would not defeat a measure which was capable of being supported on the highest moral grounds, and was based on considerations which were best for the welfare of the people. If they got the Bill through, the present Parliament would be long remembered by those who toiled in subterraneous gloom, amid terrible risks and hardships. The passing of such a measure, by reducing the hours of labour, would open the door to these men for technical education and all those subjects so much talked of; they would have more time for study and self-improvement; trade would become more steady and consistent than it was to-day; in many ways the men would be better off, and their life more worth living; and those now most opposed to the Bill would come to realise that it was one of the best things that Parliament had ever done.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*Mr. J. JOHNSON (Gateshead), in opposing the Bill, said he was sure the House would be pleased with the two speeches to which they had just listened, but notwithstanding the case they had put, he hoped the House would extend their indulgence to him while he stated the case so far as those whom he represented were concerned. If hon. Members who supported the Bill believed that he and others had a special pleasure in opposing it, they were very much mistaken. It was an easy thing to address the House and the rest of the community on a popular subject, but it was not so easy for the exponents of what might be regarded as the unpopular side, who perhaps were looked upon almost as cruel monsters. [Cries of "No, no; not at all."] He would not attempt again to go over the economic and humanitarian arguments. They had been so frequently dealt with in the House that it would be a waste of time to repeat them. He would address himself to one or two points of practical importance. Why did they oppose this Bill? They opposed it because, rightly or wrongly, they thought it would be detrimental to the men they represented. They would be enthusiastically glad if the forebodings they had put forward were neutralised, or if the evil effects they anticipated did not follow. He hoped, at any rate, that they would be given credit for having those apprehensions. He did not share the apprehension that they were going to ruin the coal-owners of Durham, because they could take care of themselves. He was thinking more of the men he represented. Another point which ought to appeal to his trade union friends in the House was that they opposed the Bill because a very large preponderance of the members of their association were against it, and he hoped that argument would have some weight. So long as the opinion prevailed amongst the men he represented that they were against an eight hours day he would continue to resist the Bill, and emphatically and boldly to put before the House his views, notwithstanding the fact that he would be opposing men whom he would rather not oppose. That was democratic. What would be said of him if he sat in the House and acted counter to the interests of men who had arrived at that decision after long and weary discussion? They had taken a census of the views of the men in Durham upon the question. In 1892 they were very anxious to find out what was the general trend of opinion in Durham, and a ballot was taken in that year which showed that 12,684 were for, and 28,217 against an eight hours day. Another ballot was taken in 1903, and the majority against an eight hours day on that occasion was larger than in 1892. He wished specially to indicate to the House as showing the trend of the opinion of the miners that on each occasion when a ballot was taken there was less than 13,000 out of a probable membership of between 80,000 to 85,000 voted in favour of an eight hours day. It might be said that their leaders did not advise them to vote for an Eight Hours Bill. Why? Because of the probable consequences which might arise. What struck him was the absolute indifference which seemed to be manifested towards certain consequences which would follow if this Bill were passed. It was well to be optimistic, and not to have too gloomy forebodings, but it was the province of coolheaded reasonable leaders before they took action to look around at the whole situation and find out whether a proposed course was going to benefit or injure those they represented. If any hon. Member would show him that the consequences he anticipated would not follow the adoption of the principle of this Bill, he would for ever hold his peace against it, because he had no objection whatever to the principle itself. What were the consequences they apprehended? In the first place they believed there would follow a very large dismissal of men. They all knew how serious that would be and what the consequences would be to the men and their families. They also feared that ultimately if the Bill passed 40,000 of their coal hewers would be asked to work eight instead of seven hours a day. It might be said that that would not be so, because the Bill provided for a maximum of eight hours. In this matter he was obliged to look at the natural trend and tendency of things. This was a measure for an eight hours day generally for miners, and if the men who worked above eight hours were asked to come down to eight, then they might rest assured that the men working below eight hours would be asked to work up to eight. That would at once prove a source of great mischief. Whatever might be the consequence he would never advise men to go from seven up to eight hours. The men he referred to had been working seven hours from bank to bank for many generations, and he was not likely to advise them to work eight hours. That was what largely influenced the men he represented against an eight hours day: they did not want their hours lengthened. It might be said that that was selfish, but it was only human nature, and men were apt to maintain the privileges they had rather than give them away. That was the reason they opposed the Bill. They did not object to shorter hours or to an eight hours day, and men had a right to ask for anything within reason which was calculated to benefit their condition and their wages. He desired to know how these changes were going to fit in so as to keep the hours of the men he represented as they were at present. Perhaps the House would bear with him whilst he made a few observations as to how these matters would fit in in Durham. Their present system of working was that the first shift of coal hewers went down the pit at four o'clock in the morning and came out between 10.30 and 11. The second shift commenced at 9.30 and left off about four o'clock. The boys went down at six o'clock in the morning and stayed on until four o'clock in one shift, so that the boys served two shifts of men, and worked ten hours. If this Bill were carried what would be the consequence? There were three alternatives. The first was one shift of eight hours for boys and one shift of seven hours for the men. The result would be that the boys would go down the pit two hours in the morning before they were wanted and would have to stop on one hour after the men left. The boys would remain an hour after the men left. Manifestly, that could not be consistent with the principle of an Eight Hours Bill. Let him take a more ridiculous position—two shifts of boys of eight hours, and two shifts of men of seven hours, making in the case of the men fourteen hours. That which he had already described would again happen. The men would go away at the end of their fourteen hours, each shift having worked seven hours, and would leave the boys two hours in the mine when there would be no coal to take away. Manifestly that was not a position which would be practicable in working. Everybody seemed to think that the most feasible arrangement would be to have three shifts of men of seven hours each, and two shifts of boys of eight hours each, making in the case of the boys sixteen hours. At the end of the sixteen hours those boys would leave their work, but the last shift of men would be four or five hours in the pit afterwards, at the special time when boys were most needed. Supposing that the boys came in two hours after the men, even in that case at the end of the third shift they would have the men in the mine three hours without anything to do, because the boys would have left, and there would be no boys to take away their coal. These were difficulties which the opponents of the Bill saw. It might be said that they were very ingeniously drawn up. No doubt science might do something towards a solution if the measure were thrust upon them. Necessity, which was the mother of invention, might do something to get over the difficulties. He was prepared to admit all that, but he hoped that hon. Members who supported the Bill would see the difficulties which he and his friends saw in this matter. The question had already occupied the attention of those interested in it, and a gentleman in the North had given a prize for the best essay on the subject. The essays were very interesting, but he would not go through the whole of them. The best that could be made out of the essays was that with an eight hours day working three shifts there would be a reduction in the output from 1,000 to 900 tons. He would not enter on the question of the financial loss which that would involve. The essays, however, had not solved the question, and they were still waiting for the man who could do it. When such a man appeared their opposition to the measure would terminate. Another serious matter was that in the North the miners objected very much to night shift working. It might be said that it did not make much difference seeing that the men were always working in the dark, but miners, like other people, had their social instincts, and they liked to devote their evenings to social occupations. One of the most serious things in connection with the proposed solution was that a large number of men would be forced to work on the night shift. He hoped the House would give some consideration to that matter. It would be said that his anticipations were very gloomy, and that they would not be realised. He was not going to move a Resolution against the Bill, nor would he and his friends even divide on the Second Reading. He and others had done their best to oppose the measure. On this occasion they did not intend to oppose the Second Reading. If the Bill was forced upon them, as it might be, they would do their best to try and work it, their desire being to have a common brotherhood, kindliness of disposition, and unanimity in the aspiration for the betterment of the miners. Notwithstanding their differences on this question there had been no personal feeling in the matter. They had had a common aim—to benefit the miners, a class that needed to be benefited and helped. He and his friends knew their dangers and hardships. They had gone through every gradation of miners' labour and they understood their needs. The House might be assured that neither the question of economics, nor any other question, would stand in the way of their efforts to secure the betterment of the condition of the miners, and making the position of the class to which they belonged, who had been rising gradually in the social and intellectual scale, still stronger and higher, and he hoped that ultimately in the matter of manhood and intelligence they would be able to say to others "Sires, we are your equals."

*Mr. CORY (Cornwall, St. Ives) said he cordially supported the principle of an eight hours day. He did not suppose that any Member of the House was not in favour of that principle. He would be very glad if he himself could put his work into eight hours a day. In that House they could not accomplish their work in eight hours a day. Recently they had three and a half shifts of eight hours all rolled into one in an atmosphere little better than that described by the hon. Member for Ince in a colliery in the North of England. He would not like to have imposed on him by Parliament an eight hours day if he wished to work longer, and he did not wish on the other hand to impose an eight hours day on those who did not desire it. The hon. Member who moved the Bill said that the Second Reading was passed last time without challenge. That being so, it was inexplicable to him why the Bill was introduced again. Why did they want a Second Reading again, when the House had accepted the principle, before the Report of the Departmental Committee had been received? The question of the effect which an eight hours day would have not only on the mining industry, but on the various industries which were dependent upon it, was now before a Departmental Committee, and he wanted to know their Report before they legislated on the subject. The hon. Member had said that the greatest number of accidents had taken place in the Swansea district, where the hours of labour were longer than in other districts. That did not appear to prove very much, because the hon. Member admitted that in other districts where a longer day than eight hours was in operation, though shorter hours than in the Swansea district, there had not been an undue number of accidents. It only proved that the hours in the Swansea district were too long, but it did not prove that eight hours might not prove too short and be a source of accidents. The hon. Member had also instanced a colliery where the pit was only seven feet in diameter, and where the atmosphere was such that horses were unable to work in it——

MR. WALSH said that was not what he stated.

*MR. CORY said he did not think he had misrepresented the hon. Member.

MR. WALSH said he made two statements, and he did not wish the hon. Member to confound them. What he said was that in the pit referred to the depth was 1,170 yards, the temperature about ninety-two degrees, and the diameter in the shaft seven feet. Then he stated that the conditions were such that industrial progress ought not to depend upon them.

*MR. CORY said he would be sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member. He understood the contention of the hon. Member to be that men were working in a pit where horses were unable to work. He could not see that that was an argument in favour of an eight hours day. That was a reason for altering the conditions of the particular colliery in question, but not a reason for altering the hours in the whole of the coal fields in the country. He could not see why they should impose conditions as to an eight hours day in pits where the workmen themselves did not desire it. The hon. Member had said that there was no need to appoint a Committee to inquire into the conditions of mining with respect to this question, as every babe that knew anything about mining matters knew them already; but whilst people interested in mining might know the conditions in connection with mining, Parliament and the general public were not skilled in the details, and it was for the purpose of informing Parliament and the general public that the Departmental Committee was now inquiring into the subject. Many statements had been made during the course of the debate with which he could not agree. Employers were still in the dark as to what would be the effect of an eight hours day, and if they thought that it would be disadvantageous to the trade it was hardly possible that they could approach the miners in regard to the matter as it was suggested by the hon. Member for Hanley that they should do. They would wait for the report of the Departmental Committee before making up their minds. The hon. Member for Hanley had also stated that it had been said that the trade unions themselves could bring about this change, but that the effect of that would be one of the most disastrous strikes that had ever taken place in the history of the country. He was willing to admit that that might be the case, but so far as Monmouthshire and South Wales were concerned where they had a nine hours day, or fifty-four hours per week, if this Bill were passed there must be some alteration in the lists of prices as the wages were based on a nine hours day, and that would undoubtedly lead to a general strike before fresh terms could be agreed. The hon. Member for Gateshead had referred to the question of the dismissal of men that would take place if the Bill was passed. For his part he believed it would bring about the dismissal of men not only in the counties of Durham and Northumberland, but throughout the whole of the coal districts of the country. In the event of old men being employed they would work at great strain. They would have to hurry to and from their work, they would have to hurry over their work, and would not have time to look about to see if their place were safe, nor to prepare their stall for the next day, and they all knew that when a man got old he did not care to "hustle." But if an eight hours day were established instead of a nine hours day, the probability was that employers would naturally select young, vigorous men who would put out the same amount of coal in the restricted day as had been put out in the longer day of nine hours. The hon. Member for Gateshead had said it had been estimated that the reduction of the output might amount to 10 per cent., but that the increase in price of coal, in his belief, would, on that account, be very slight. But at times when prices had been most inflated it had been estimated that the excess of demand over supply had only been about 5 per cent., which had brought about these very high prices, and how much more then would prices increase if the supply was reduced by 10 per cent. The Memorandum to the Bill said that it was proposed by the Bill that the hours of work below ground in coal mines should be gradually reduced until they reached the limit of eight hours. He should not object to the Bill if the wording of the Memorandum was carried out in its clauses. But it was not. Under Clause 1, sub-section (2), however, the employment underground would not be anything like eight hours. An eight hours day from bank to bank would mean, probably, not much more than five or six hours actual work below ground, as from the eight hours would have to be deducted the time occupied in letting the men down and bringing them up the shaft; the time occupied by the men in going to and from the pit bottom to the face of the coal, which varied more or less in every colliery and in every seam, and in some places was a long way in; so that with the reduced output and necessarily increased cost, he did not see how it was possible to work certain pits under these conditions. Again, they could not let down or draw up all the men at one time. The time occupied in letting men down and drawing them up again at the end of the day would amount to from one and a half to two hours. How, then, could they ensure that the men who went down first were the first to come up, and without that, how was an eight hours day from bank to bank practicable? The hon. Member for Ince seemed to have changed his views on this matter, because at the Miners' Conference held in October, 1904, the report of the proceedings of which appeared in the Wigan Examiner, the hon. Gentleman stated that Lancashire was opposed to the eight hours day from bank to bank, and he said that the Lancashire miners would oppose it, unless the Miners' Federation insisted upon their having it. He presumed that the Miners' Federation had pressed the Lancashire miners in a very forcible way.

MR. WALSH said that the Bill had been entirely changed. It was to come into operation only after an interval of three years instead of one year.

*MR. CORY said that that did not change the Bill, the only difference it made was that it would come into operation by degrees instead of all at once. The Miners' Federation might force the Lancashire miners to change their opinion, and adopt the eight hours movement against their will; but he could hardly think that that was a sufficient reason for allowing the Miners' Federation to force the House of Commons to impose it on the whole community without sufficient thought and consideration of the subject. Of course, one of the remedies suggested was a double shift; but that system had been rejected by the men themselves, and he was not surprised at that. The men who worked by day in a stall would object to other men working at night in the same stall. Moreover, even if the men did not object to the double shift system, he questioned whether there would be a sufficient number of miners obtainable in the country to work the double shift. Again, the third eight hours would not afford enough time for repairs to be properly done in the main roads. Therefore, one of the drawbacks to an eight hours day was that it would be a danger to the men themselves. Again, it was not a question which affected only the coal owners and the coal miners, but one which affected the whole of the coal consumers of the country. For a time, he admitted, owing to the restriction of output, probably resulting in a coal famine, the change would so enhance prices as to enable the coal owners to make huge fortunes, and the colliers good wages. But, in the long run, the consumers in the country, having to pay dearer for their coal, the dependent industries would be crippled, demand would fall off, and the coal trade would lose its customers and be injured. The hon. Member for Ince had remarked that the Miners' Federation had refused to give evidence before the Departmental Committee. Why? If their case was so good as they would have the public to believe, he would have thought that they would have rushed to the Committee in the hope of converting the coal owners and the public generally to their views. On the other hand, the employers had not been afraid to put their evidence before the Committee, and in fact had asked for such a Committee of Inquiry, so as to give evidence on every point. As he had already said, he was in no way opposed to the principle of an eight hours day; but a Departmental Committee having been appointed to inquire into the economic aspects of the whole question, he contended that, as wise men, they should wait to obtain the Report of that Committee, which no doubt would contain interesting and important information. He therefore pressed upon hon. Gentlemen who had promoted this Bill that they would be well advised not to push the matter further now, but to wait patiently for the Report of the Departmental Committee.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER (Liverpool, Everton) congratulated the hon. Members who had moved and seconded the Second Reading of the Bill on the tone of their speeches and the moderation of their attacks upon the coal owners, the way in which they had approached the subject, and their references to the Conciliation Board. That Board had done great good in connection with the consideration of wages, and he much regretted that this question could not have been dealt with by it. The Bill was read a second time on the 11th of May last year. It was read without a division, and so far as he was concerned, he was not going to vote against it now. He believed he was right in saying, however, that on that occasion it was read under the distinct understanding that full advantage would be taken of the appointment of the Departmental Committee in order to consider the details of the case, so that when the Bill came forward again the difficulties as to details would have been dealt with and provided for in the Bill. That was not the case in the Bill before the House. He would not say that hon. Gentlemen representing the miners did not come before that Committee because they did not desire to be cross-examined on some statements they had made, but he thought the reason they would not come before the Committee was that they would not face cross-examination on some of these points of detail.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda) said the Miners' Federation had never agreed to the appointment of that Committee, and would not go before it.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER said the Departmental Committee was appointed, and, as everybody knew, in these matters all sorts of statements were made, but when people had to give evidence and had to be cross-examined as to the truth of the statements, those statements were frequently found to be only half the truth. A great many Amendments would be required to perfect the Bill. He appealed to hon. Members of the Miners Federation to attend before the Committee and give evidence as to the difficulties of the case in order that the Bill might be made effective. The Bill declared that men should not be employed for a greater length of time than that specified in this Act, and then followed nine hours, eight and a half hours, and eight hours, according to the work engaged in. How was a man to be labelled when he went down the mine? and when he was down the mine and in his place, how were they to follow that man and say it was six o'clock when he went down, it was now half-past one, and time he went up. That was an easy thing to accomplish in a workshop, but not in a mine. That was a difficulty that appealed to the employers, and hon. Members should go before the Committee and explain how it was to be got over. Coal owners were not against the Bill if they could see that it could be carried out in a proper way, but they wanted hon. Gentlemen opposite to assist them in saying how it could be carried out. The mere statement that men should not work for more than eight hours a day, without its being shown how that sugestion was to be carried out, did not help them. There were other difficulties. For instance, the coal hewers did work longer hours. The coal hewer worked nine hours a day, but after he had finished his work his coal had to be hauled away. At the end of the day the hewer had to get his coal out to the pit's mouth in order to have it credited to him. How was that going to be arranged.

for under the Bill? Undoubtedly there was a tendency to rush the work just before the close of the day, and under this Bill, if the hewer worked up to his time, there would be nobody in the mine to take out this coal. Unless the second shift was to bring out these boxes of coal they must remain in the mine till next day; the second shift could not do it, because it would take them two hours and for the other six they would not have anything to do. That was one of the difficulties which they wished hon. Members to assist the Committee in dealing with. Then there was the question of repairers—the men who repaired the roads and the brick work and did similar work in the mines. Under this Bill no man could remain in the mine more than eight hours from bank to bank. Was a bricklayer who was at work in the pit at the end of eight hours with one and a half hours work to finish to leave his work? These questions hon. Members did not answer, and yet it was their answers to these questions which would be so beneficial in assisting the House to get over the difficulties involved and make it possible to pass the Bill. There were also other questions. The hon. Member for Ince had referred to the seven-foot diameter shafts. It was a fact that a large number of mines in this country had shafts of small diameters—seven, ten, thirteen, and fifteen feet. This Bill would have the effect of closing all those small shaft mines. It was certain that all the mines that had small diameters would be closed if this Bill passed.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER said that those mines had been opened and worked for years, and it would not pay to make larger shafts, and the result would be that a considerable amount of the coal of this country would be lost through the closing down of these small diameter shaft mines. If it was agreed that we were to lose that coal well and good, but who was to bear the loss? Was it the man who had taken the mine at a head rent and had undertaken to work the mine until the coal was worked out, or was it the landlord, or who was it? He was very glad to see that neither the mover nor the seconder of this Bill had referred to the "tyrannical powers" exercised by the mine owners. It had been said in the past and even in the present that the work of the miners had been such as to impair their health, and that a miner came to the bank so fagged that he was unable to enjoy the period of leasure at his disposal when he reached home. That was a common statement in the past, and it spoke well for the coal owners that such a state of things did not exist at the present time. It was a good thing to hear that the health of the miners was not so affected. The principle of more leisure being given to the men had been accepted by this House last year and it would not be resisted now, but hon. Gentlemen should submit themselves for examination before the Departmental Committee in order to clear up the points he had drawn attention to. If they referred to the past they would see that the owners had not exercised any tyrannical powers over the men on this question, and, if they had liked, the Miners' Federation, with their immense powers, could have stopped these long hours. It was not because the men were compelled to work long hours that they did so, but because when once they were down in the pit they wished to make a good day and get as much coal as possible in order to make high wages. It was the action of the men alone and not the tyranny of the employer that was responsible for the long hours, and the allegation that it was the tyranny of the employers was hardly a fair one. The Trade Union and Miners' Federation were just as much responsible for the long hours as the mine owners. He appealed to hon. Members, therefore, to assist the Government to bring in perfect regulations and not to put the House to the inconvenience of passing an immense number of Amendments in order to make the Bill workable. Let them give the Committee the benefit of their opinion as to how an eight hours day could be provided without militating against the trade. He certainly thought, unless the conditions were proper and well regulated, the Bill would impose a great burden on the consumer. If only hon. Members would refer back to the time when coal was 14s. 6d. a ton at the pit's mouth they would find two things—first, that the effect of it was excellent as regards putting money into the miners' pockets and dividends into the pockets of the coal owners, but, secondly, that it ended in the destruction of a great deal of the trade of the country. Great industries were lost to Germany and other places. Therefore, when this question was brought forward again it was necessary to deal with the matter in a proper spirit in order to render the Bill workable and fair, not only to the miners and the mine owners, but to the trade and consumers of the country.

* SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he did not propose to make an appeal in favour of either the mine owners or the miners. He was fortunate enough to posesss the confidence of both the employers and the employed, and he proposed to speak in favour of both. He would direct the attention of the House chiefly to the point of view of the consumers. He congratulated his hon. friend the Member for Ince on the clear statement he had made and the figures which had done so much to elucidate the difficulties of this most anxious problem. There was only one remark on the valuable and interesting speech which he wished to make, and that was in respect to the action of the employers with regard to the checkweighmen in the last session of the late Parliament. The employers of labour then stated their case as they were bound and entitled to do before the House and the Standing Committee. But when the last stage was reached they entirely withdrew their opposition, and the Checkweight Act was passed with entire unanimity by the employers and the employed. He did not impugn the accuracy of the figures or doubt their lucidity, but at the same time the House ought to remember when a case of this kind was presented to them that there was at present a Committee sitting to investigate the whole of this problem. It was one thing to assist that Committee with evidence and figures, but quite another to interpret those figures. It was the function of the Committee to put an interpretation upon the figures. They had to decide how far a limited number of hours of labour would reduce the output, and what the probable reduction of hours should be. A considerable reduction of hours must lead to a proportionate reduction of output, and the output of coal in this country was a national question of the greatest gravity. It was impossible that there could be a reduction of output without an increase of cost, which meant a tax on every other industry in the country. More than that, it meant a tax on every consumer of coal from one end of the country to the other. This was essentially one of those questions which, though it was a working man's question on one side, was a question of all classes of the community on the other. He was surprised that those representing agricultural districts had not been alive to the burdens that this Bill would throw on their constituents. Another serious result of the diminution of output was that if the amount of coal produced was diminished, the amount carried would also be diminished, and labour in the transport trades would be diminished, and on the railways engaged in the traffic less labour would be employed. That was a point of view which was not unworthy of consideration in the discussion of the question. There were some who thought the mere reduction of hours would give the safety which was desired. But there was another question to be considered namely, the hardship which might be inflicted on the older men who had to get their living with less hours in which to get it. If they diminished the hours of labour they would decrease the output and in all probability diminish the earnings that a man was able to bring home with him at the end of a week of honourable and laborious toil. He hoped no misinterpretation would be placed upon his remark when he said he did not think the lot of the working miner was so hard and so severe as some thought. All those who were engaged in laborious occupations deserved and commanded the sympathy of the House, but he did not think anything was gained by hon. Members exaggerating the misfortunes and hardships of their lot. If he was not wrongly informed the working miner did not work more that nine days in a fortnight. He had every Saturday to himself; he had the opportunity of not working when he was not disposed to do so, and had in many other respects more liberty than any other class. He wished to assist these men to raise themselves in point of culture. The collier of his boyhood was a different man from the miner of his old age. The improvement that had taken place in one generation would, he believed, continue, and he was sure the House would never cease to lend a friendly hand to the labouring man who earned his bread by his daily toil, and would at the same time exercise care and forethought in order that his calling might be made secure and his wages rendered permanent and safe.

*COLONEL HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.) said that no Member of the House could listen to the hon. Baronet without feeling the earnestness with which the hon. Gentleman would endeavour to improve the lot of the worker, and the carefully balanced mind he brought to bear on the argument on both sides of the case. He would, however, remind the hon. Gentleman that there was a time not very long ago when the employment of women in the work of the mines was before the House, and that at that time the hon. Baronet showed some anxiety as to whether the reform then proposed would not lead to distress in the mining districts. Everybody was liable to mistakes, and he might be excused for recalling that incident in order to point the moral that the dangers some saw in this Bill were not so great as they might appear. The hon. Member for the Everton Division appeared to be under some misapprehension as to the circumstances under which the Second Reading of the Bill was taken last year. The hon. Member was apparently under the impression that it was taken on the understanding that the Bill should proceed no further until after the Departmental Committee had reported. His recollection did not confirm that view, but rather the contrary. He had a distinct recollection that, objection having been raised both inside and outside the House against the appointment of that Committee, they refused to attend it. He had a distinct recollection of the raising by the hon. Member for South Glamorgan of the question of the appointment of the Committee on the Vote for the salary of the Home Secretary in order to emphasise the opposition of the Miners Federation to the appointment of that Committee. He thought the hon. Member for the Everton Division of Liverpool who, he was sure, had no desire or intention to mislead the House, must have been under a misapprehension. It was not his intention to add much more to the arguments which had been so admirably put forward by the mover and seconder of the Bill, but he would like to deal with one point that had been raised, viz., the age which the measure had attained. The hon. Member for the Ince Division had said that the Bill had attained its twenty-first year. What twenty-one years ago were the conditions that obtained in the Division he (Colonel Herbert) now had the honour to represent? At that time it was a simple rural neighbourhood; now it was a thickly-populated colliery district. There were collieries there twenty-one years ago, but they were of a very different character from those that existed at the present time. The workers in those collieries were dwellers in rural farm-houses, and in cottages on the breezy hillsides of the Welsh mountains. The lives of those men were very different—their conditions of life were vastly different—from those imposed upon the workers of to-day, and it was that change in their conditions of life which made it imperative to introduce legislation to deal with the hours of labour. They had examples in the House which showed that the work in the coal mines in the past certainly did not injure physical development. They had, however, to consider the effect of mining work upon the coming generation, and it was only by a measure such as the one before them that they could be assured of a continuation of that splendid physique which they had among the miners representatives in the House at the present time.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) said he had listened with great interest to the remarks which had fallen from the various speakers during the debate. It was gratifying that the subject had been approached in a spirit of great moderation, because it was only by moderation that the difficulties of the question could be overcome. He was also exceedingly gratified to understand from the speeches they had heard that it was not looked upon as an absolute crime to be connected with a coal owner. Perhaps he might be allowed to give a few reasons which he considered militated against the effective operation of Bills limiting employment in mines to eight hours a day. The principal reason advanced was that it would militate against the consumer of coal by increasing the price, and secondly, that it would hamper those industries whose possibilities depended upon obtaining cheap coal. This was not a new Bill, neither was it a new idea. The matter was fully discussed last May in a debate which showed equal moderation to the debate of that day, and the question was referred to a Departmenal Committee which was still engaged in considering it. He joined in the appeal of the hon. Member for the Everton Division of Liverpool that hon. Members below the gangway who were most interested in the scheme, and were in a position to know most about the matter, should do their utmost to give their assistance to the Departmental Committee, and he hoped that those hon. Members would respond to that appeal. In view of the fact that the Departmental Committee was sitting at the present time, he thought the discussion they had had in the House that afternoon, although most interesting, was somewhat premature. It was urged in support of the Bill that such legislation as this was necessary for the protection of the health of the miners. That might have been urged thirty years ago, but he thought that the modern conditions under which the miner worked precluded such an argument. With the present system of ventilation in mines it could not fairly be urged that the work was injurious to health for those engaged in the industry; in fact, statistics proved the reverse, and showed that the percentage of illness among miners was lower than among any other section of the population in the country. Another argument in support of the Bill was that the great bulk of the mining population were in favour of the limitation of the hours of working. He thought there was a good deal of misapprehension in the minds of many people as to the amount of work which really was executed by miners, and perhaps some hon. Members would agree with him that it was trespassing upon the liberty of the individual to forbid him, by a Parliamentary measure, working more than eight hours a day if he wished to do so. Further than that, he did not see how it would be possible to carry out the regulations. Another objection to the proposal was that the scheme would result in a diminution of output. The great disadvantage of that was that if there were a serious diminution of the coal output it would paralyse many other industries which were dependent on a cheap coal supply. Further, it was the opinion of representatives of working men that the scheme, too, would injure the working classes. There was a great deal to be said on that score, because it would mean a revolution of the working man's mode of living, and a dislocation of trade. If there was any substance in those contentions, and they had never been denied, the effect of the Bill upon all concerned would be, indeed, serious. The coal mines on the west coast of England were far deeper than those on the east coast, so that if the hours were shortened to any great extent it would be impossible to obtain so much of the coal which was situated far from the mouth of the pit, and consequently the competition of the west and the east would be accentuated to a very great degree. He did not think there was any need to dilate upon the question of decreased output. A decreased output meant an increased cost of production. It was thought by some that the coal owner reaped enormous benefit, but it should be borne in mind that the margin between the cost of production and actual profit was often very small indeed. Sometimes it existed only in years of exceptional prosperity. In the effect upon wages which such a scheme would produce, they must first of all think of the miners who were paid by the piece. These men, with shorter hours, would not be able to produce so much coal, and consequently their wages would be diminished while in the case of the miners paid by the,day, one of two things would happen. Either they must be paid the same as at present, despite the shorter hours, which would mean additional cost of production, or there must be a reduction in proportion to the shorter hours. In the county of Durham he anticipated no great difficulty, because it was gratifying to think that very friendly relations existed between employers and employed, thanks to the excellent work of the Board of Conciliation. It was obvious that the managers of the coal mines must look after their own interests, and the scheme would militate against the employment of older men. It had been said that the Bill would not affect the safety of a colliery, but he thought it would, because if the men were employed shorter hours it would be to their interest to accelerate the work done, and if the winding and hauling arrangements were unduly hastened there was danger to be apprehended. He did not believe the Bill would realise the benefits the promoters claimed for it.

*MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley) supported the Bill, not only because he had the honour to represent in that House 11,000 coal miners, but also because he conscientiously believed it to be a measure of justice. Having regard to the arduous and dangerous character of mining employment, he held emphatically that it was right and proper that there should be legislative interference with the hours of labour. The main opposition to the Bill emanated from Durham. Originally the opposition came from the counties of Northumberland and Durham, but he was glad to know that on this occasion the majority, at all events, of the miners in Northumberland had fallen into line with the miners who supported the Bill. Durham now was the only exception. As regarded the difficulties of the application of the measure to the county of Durham, he could not help feeling that they had been greatly exaggerated. At the present time, out of 93,000 men and boys employed in the Durham collieries, 69,000 were already working only eight hours or under, and only 24,000, including boys, were working more than eight hours. The noble Lord who spoke last was afraid that if the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill was passed the Durham hewers would not be able to continue producing coal at the present rate. It was incorrect to state that the average hours of the Durham hewers was now seven hours fifty-two minutes from bank to bank, because in the evidence given before the Departmental Committee it was shown that the average period per day of coal hewers' work was only six hours and forty-nine minutes from bank to bank. That being so, any fear of a diminution in the output so far as the working at the coal face was concerned fell to the ground. The coal hewer would work the same length of time, in fact he could work longer, if he desired to do so, and the consuming public need have no fear that the production of coal on the face would suffer a decrease; the reverse would probably be the case. The problem they had to face in the county of Durham was how to get the coal from the face to the surface under the Eight Hours Bill. To get to bank the produce of two shifts in eight hours, which they now got to bank in ten hours, was the problem they had to face. They knew that they could bring to their aid increased mechanical appliances. His opinion was, that if a large number of our older collieries were owned by citizens of the United States of America they would dismantle the antiquated plants and fit the mines with modern appliances, which would mean that they would employ mechanical haulage and electricity to bring the coal from the workings at the face to the bottom of the shaft, to an infinitely greater extent than those appliances were at present employed. They would increase enormously the weight of coal raised by each lift of the winding engine from the bottom of the shaft to the surface. An increased number of coal tubs might also be filled in advance of the hours of winding. With the adoption of such measures the difficulties in the way of the Bill would be largely if not altogether overcome. There was no difference of opinion as to the desirability of reducing the hours of labour of boys employed underground. He was glad to know that Northumberland was now supporting the reduction of the hours of boys to eight hours, and all agreed in the desirability of reducing the hours of labour of boys, yet they had at the present time in the county of Durham men who were working from bank to bank only six hours and forty-nine minutes, while the boys were working nine hours and forty-five minutes, according to evidence given before the Departmental Committee. That was a condition of things which they ought to exercise all the ingenuity they possessed to overcome and redress. He was glad to know that this measure passed the Second Reading last year without challenge. To-day it appeared that the same course would be pursued. [Sir F. BANBURY: No.] He knew that his hon. friend the Member for the City of London, who had the courage of his convictions, would even go into the lobby alone, provided he could get tellers. He dared say that they would have the pleasure of a division, and that this measure would have the éclat of passing its Second Reading by an unprecedented and overwhelming majority. Endeavours had been made to create the impression that its passage would enormously increase the cost of coal, and, therefore, seriously injure those manufactures which depended upon the coal. He had read a good deal of the evidence contained in the two Bluebooks which had been issued by the Departmental Committee, and he had there seen an illustration of how extravagant and exaggerated statements were made. In the case of the Workmen's Compensation Act it was said that the passing of that Act would raise the price of coal by 3d. or 4d., or even 6d. per ton. What had proved to be the result? He happened to be interested in a mutual insurance association of coalowners in the county of Durham, and he thought his hon. friend the Member for Mid. Durham would be able to confirm him when he said that the average cost of the Workmen's Compensation Act to the coalowners of the county of Durham had been only two-thirds of a penny per ton. Representations had been made that the working of the Mines (Eight Hours) Bill would increase the cost of the production of coal by as much as 2s. per ton. He could only say from his own knowledge of coal mining that they were entitled to take a similar discount off those statements which experience proved had to be taken off the statements with regard to the cost of the Workmen's Compensation Act. He did not deny that the cost of production of coal, at any rate for some years, would be increased by the operation of this Bill. He had two carefully prepared statements by a number of colliery managers in the county of Durham as to what, in their opinion, would be the economic effect of the application of the Bill. In one case the estimate was an increased cost of 3d. per ton and in the other case an increased cost of 4d. per ton. He thought, however, that he was warranted in saying that within a reasonable time that increased cost would be somewhat reduced. While they were face to face with an increase in the cost of coal in the endeavour to solve this problem, yet it would be no such disastrous increase as would prove injurious to coal consuming industries, and the reasons in support of the Bill were such as to justify the demand for a limitation of the hours of labour. A young lad of the age of thirteen years, who had to get up at five o'clock in the morning to go to work for ten hours underground, could not be fit at the close of that period, either physically or mentally, for anything in the nature of evening classes or the continuance of educational pursuits. He considered that the community had no right to impose onerous conditions upon any section for their own enrichment. Even if they had to pay a trifle more for their coal it was worth the cost, if it could be shown that they were raising the standard of education and encouraging and improving the growing lads who were employed in the coal trade to the number of 65,000. There was a good case for the sympathetic consideration and support of the House, and he had the greatest pleasure in supporting the Second Reading.

*MR. FINDLAY (Lanarkshire, N.E.) said that if he might judge from the number of petitions which he had received from the various mining districts of Lanarkshire in favour of this Bill, he was satisfied that the miners there were very anxious that it should become law. He had no personal knowledge of underground work, and he desired to remain above ground as long as he might be permitted, but he felt that eight hours was a long enough time for anyone to be below ground. He was very gratified indeed to hear the sympathetic support already given by the House to the Bill. They had in Lanarkshire some conditions which did not obtain in other parts of the country, for they had there a large proportion of alien labour, which he thought was not desirable from the point of view that many of the foreign miners were unacquainted with the English language. All these things helped to accentuate the difficulties which the miners in Lanarkshire experienced in connection with their employment. He was not one of those who took a pessimistic view of the difficulties this Bill might create, because he believed, with the hon. Member who had just spoken, that there were ways and means by which those difficulties could be overcome. One was also gratified to know that in regard to ventilation and other improvements which had been adopted, the condition of the miners was superior to what it was not so very long ago. But notwithstanding all these advantages, he was satisfied that the Bill was desired by the large majority of miners in Scotland and he hoped it would have a Second Reading by consent of the House.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.), who was indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the arguments of the hon. Member for Barnsley were hardly in favour of the Bill. According to the hon. Member's own showing, in Durham and Northumberland the hewers worked six hours forty-nine minutes, and that had been done, not by a compulsory Act of Parliament, but by arrangement between the coalowners and workmen. Nobody would pretend that in the county of Durham they approved of long hours for boys, but he maintained that the conditions could be better ameliorated by mutual and friendly arrangement than by a hard-and-fast Act of Parliament. The hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill had told them that the evidence given before the Departmental Committee could be understood by every schoolboy. He was very glad to be told so, because the instructions given to the Committee were of such a character that he was reminded of Captain Kidd. The Committee had a sort of roving commission, and the subjects they had to consider were so numerous that he rather doubted whether they could be understood by every schoolboy. Anyone who read the evidence given before the Committee upstairs would see that they had the testimony only partially before them. They had not received the evidence of two of the principal districts —Northumberland and Durham. He was informed that one of them was in favour of the Bill and that the other was against it. Surely it would be premature on the part of the House to come to a decision before, at all events, they had heard the evidence of those two districts. Mr. Cunningham, one of the witnesses who had given evidence before the Committee, said the Bill was perfectly useless, because it did not lay down what had got to be done. The same witness also said that it was not of the slightest use to pass an Act saying that a man should not remain underground more than eight hours if Parliament did not provide directions or means by which it could be carried out. Mr. Cunningham went on to say that if the Home Office had to carry it out they would require a very much larger staff than they had at the present moment; and he pointed out various difficulties that would arise with the Home Office unless it was instructed by Parliament how to deal with these matters. Mr. Cunningham also referred to the eight hours day in France, and his evidence went to show that the conditions in that country under the Act were very wide indeed, and did not apply to every man below ground; there were numerous exemptions. It had also been pointed out by the hon. Member for Gateshead that in the case of Durham the Bill would increase instead of shorten the hours of labour. He hoped that the House would pause before it consented to pass this Bill, which had been thrown in the teeth of the Government, who had appointed a Committee to examine into the great economic processes which were involved in the question. The members of the Committee were taking the greatest pains to arrive at a decision on these economic questions, which were not such as every schoolboy could understand; and he regarded it almost as an insult to that Committee to say that the inquiry in which they were engaged was such as could be understood by every schoolboy. He hoped that the Bill would be resisted by the Government who had appointed that Committee, and that the House would wait until they had the evidence before them, so that they might be enabled to arrive at a definite and sound conclusion on this important matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) said it was hardly necessary for him to tell the House that the Government supported the Second Reading of this Bill. Last year, when the Bill was before the House, he stated the position of the Government. That position they not only adhered to, but were bound to adhere to. He had listened very carefully to the debate, and in particular to the speeches of the hon. mover and seconder. Perhaps he might be allowed to congratulate both hon. Members on the excellence and eloquence of their speeches. But his hon. friend the Member for Ince had told the House not exactly in terms, but he wished the House to understand, that neither he nor anyone else who knew anything about the subject, had anything to learn—["No, no."]—at an rate, that this Bill has been brought before the House for something like twenty years, that the arguments were worn threadbare, and that there was no reason for the appointment of a Committee, as it could throw no light on any subjects which were necessary to the consideration of the Bill, and that, in fact, it was a waste of time endeavouring to get fresh evidence or fresh light on the matter. Might he point out to the House this fact? They agreed that so far as the general figures which bore on this great issue were concerned, the figures showing output and the number of workers and so on—the broad general figures—they had ample information. But those were not the figures necessary to detailed examination when they came to the practical drafting of the Bill. General knowledge was an excellent thing, he agreed. His hon. friend had much general knowledge, he knew. He had special and particular knowledge of the industry with which he was connected. He could instruct most of them on the practical working of a colliery. But that was not enough, when they were considering this question, as he should have occasion to point out in the course of his remarks. He was in a somewhat difficult position, because he had to justify the action of the Government in setting up this Committee, which had been and was being talked of by many hon. Members on both sides of the House as being unnecessary. No man occupying the position he did, and responsible for the department which had to administer the Coal Mines Act, would take the responsibility of accepting the Bill as it stood as the basis upon which to work. In appointing the Committee the Government acted honestly to get information so as to be able to fill in the details of the measure. If that Committee had been appointed for dilatory purposes because they wished to avoid an awkward question, then he agreed hon. Members would have a serious grievance, but there was no idea of dilatory tactics. The appointment of the Committee was an honest action designed to further the Bill, the principle of which was accepted last year. Nothing was more objectionable to a Minister or a Department than to have hanging over their heads a great question unsettled. The question cropped up continually, and it was always giving trouble. Every administrator who knew his business wished to get through his work not only at the earliest possible moment, but in the most practical form possible. If the result of the appointment of this Committee had been to delay the Bill then he was one of the principal sufferers, because it put not only himself but his Department to great inconvenience and trouble. No one would deny that the gentlemen who served on the Committee were eminently qualified, and had worked exceedingly hard to get through their task. They would probably finish in a few weeks. There had been no delay there. It should be remembered this was but the second session of a new Parliament, and they had six years before them. He had been somewhat disappointed that the Committee had not been able to report earlier. When appointed, the Committee had asked for information necessary to open up the questions left to them, and the Home Office had not the requisite information.

MR. WALSH said they knew all about the evidence given before the Committee, but it was being given in a glorified form.

*MR. GLADSTONE said it was essential to have exact information. For instance, in the debate last year it was stated that the average number of days miners worked was four a week. Exact inquiries proved the average number of days per week in 1906 worked by collieries was five and-a-quarter, and that the average number of hours worked by men fell short of the maximum by seven per cent. That showed that the figures previously given to the House would not bear the test of inquiry. He maintained that it was necessary to have exact information upon these very important points. If he were to ask any hon. Member representing the miners to give him the figures showing how many men now worked eight hours or less from bank to bank underground, and how many worked above eight hours, could he answer? He knew that no hon. Member could answer that question unless he had seen the Return compiled by the Committee. He was sure the House would at once realise how important figures of that sort were. He was not arguing against the Bill, but simply giving facts in support of the appointment of the Committee. In legislating to impose a uniform eight hours day upon all miners in the country, it was important to know how many men the Act would affect. The figures showed that an eight hours limit, whether right or wrong, would have a very considerable effect; for the number of men who worked eight hours, or less, from bank to bank was 131,000, whereas the number of those who worked more than eight hours was 449,000. These figures were in favour of those who supported the Bill, because they showed that the larger number of men were working longer than they ought.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) asked if those figures included boys.

*MR. GLADSTONE replied that the figures included the boys working underground. He would like to tell the House what information they had before the Committee was appointed. There was a Return moved for in 1890, and there was the table of statistics placed before the Royal Commission on Labour in 1892. That was the last table issued which gave any details of the rates of wages paid per week in the collieries, but the table had been compiled from sources which were not authoritative. Therefore, it would be seen that the only Return they had was one issued some fifteen years ago. Further, the Government wanted reliable information as to the different methods of working in the different districts, and the number of mines likely to be seriously affected, or perhaps irretrievably damaged, by an absolute limitation of hours. They were in possession of no information as to the probable effect upon prices of an Eight Hours Mines Act. He agreed with the mover and seconder of the Bill that the prophecies of ruin and loss had been greatly exaggerated. Certainly, they would not be sufficient to deter the House from going forward with the Bill. At the same time, it was essential to know how they stood. The speculations hazarded by hon. Members were not so reliable as the facts obtained by a close, careful and exact scientific examination and consideration of all the circumstances and conditions. The preparation and tabulation of the figures had caused much more delay than he expected, because the information at the disposal of the Government was found to be much less than he anticipated last year when he spoke upon the subject. And was not such information necessary? Was not the least that any responsible Government would do, which wished to forward the prospects of the Bill, to obtain that information? The price of coal was a matter of interest to everybody, not only to steamship and railway companies and manufacturers, but also to wage earners. He was not deterred by the consideration that some people—not only coal-owners, but certainly some coal-miners also—would suffer by this Bill. Small disturbances and difficulties could not be regarded when there was a great public object in view. But it must be remembered that in this great industry, including the metalliferous mines, 900,000 persons were employed, and when they considered how the trade of the country depended to a large extent on the price of coal, it was the first duty of the Government to know how they stood before they took the responsibility of passing a Bill like this, which would undoubtedly effect a very great change. He would like to give to the House one or two other illustrations of what he meant. He asked hon. Members how they accounted for the change which had come over the Forest of Dean in regard to this question. His right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean was a convinced supporter of the eight hours day principle, and he had taken a leading part in support of this measure ever since it had been before the House. But what had happened? He reminded the House that the agent of the Forest of Dean miners gave evidence before the Committee on this subject, and his evidence was against this proposal. Why had the miners of the Forest of Dean changed their opinion?

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): And the owners. the owners have accepted a limitation.

*MR. GLADSTONE said he did not quote this against the Bill—he was for the Bill—but he only quoted it to show that the problem was not so simple. He would tell the House why the Forest of Dean miners had changed their views. The ways in that district were very long, and two to three hours were occupied in going to and from the coal face. Two or three hours per day would be taken from the eight hours day.

MR. WALSH: You can consider this in Committee.

*MR. GLADSTONE said he would ask his hon. friend whether, with these facts before them, the Government could go before a Committee, and make themselves responsible for the Bill? It would have to be in a very different shape before it could pass the House. It would be his duty as representing the Government to graft on to the Bill as they went along many additional clauses which were necessary. He would have to ascertain what was the reason for this action on the part of the miners of the Forest of Dean, and he would have to consider whether the evidence of their agent was such as would force him to consider their case and meet it in the Bill. On each point he would have to consider all the circumstances he had indicated, and his position would be simply impossible. The experience of the French had not been touched upon. In this matter France was ahead of this country, because they had already got what was called an eight hours law. Perhaps he might remind the House of the nature of that law. It laid down that six months after the passing of the Act the time worked by coal hewers was not to exceed nine hours calculated from the last batch of men entering the pit to the arrival above ground of the first men. There were many exemptions and exceptions to meet special circumstances of different mines and emergencies. Was it proposed to make exemptions and exceptions in this Bill? The French, who considered this question practically, included in their Act such provisions as they thought necessary, and also limited its scope to what they thought would be safe, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. But now, two years later, they found that an amendment of the Act was necessary. They found the greatest difficulty in enforcing the Act. There were certain penalties provided in regard to the enforcement of the Act, but they said that in many respects the Act had failed, and that it could not be enforced. They had tried "peaceful persuasion," but it had not succeeded. It was true that they were proposing to extend the limitation of the hours to all classes of underground workers. They found that difficult in working out, and they were now engaged drafting a new Bill. Although at every point that Bill was made elastic by the granting of exemptions, after two years experience they found it necessary to amend it. That went to show that our position must be looked at, at least as carefully as the French were looking at their position. The number of miners employed in this country was three or four times as great as the number engaged in the coal industry of France. Moreover the coal industry of this country was of far greater national importance, and of far greater importance to the individual, than the coal industry of France was to the trade and commerce of that country. There were one or two points he wished to dwell upon, partly because they were suggested by the French experience, and partly because they had been brought up and were being dealt with by the Committee. This Bill proposed a hard and fast limitation of eight hours for all underground workers. Were they going to allow any exemptions? If so, what were they? That was a matter which wanted most careful consideration. How would it be in the case of the higher officials underground—the managers, firemen and overmen, or whatever the term might be, who were concerned with the safety of the mine? The duty of those men was to go down the pit, very often two hours before the men, to see that all was safe, and some of them had to stay in the mine till after the men were withdrawn. Therefore, supposing, for the sake of argument, that those men were working ten hours, was that exception to be made? If the exception was not to be made, they would force the mine-owners to double that particular branch of their staff in order to make good the deficiency caused by the overlapping of a couple of hours. That was a question of importance. There was the question of a possible reduction of the output, which had an important bearing on the question of the price of coal. In France, according to his information, the attempt to work an eight hours day for the men had been to cause a reduction in the output of 5 per cent. It would probably be higher in this country if it were a uniform eight hours day. The question was what would be the amount of the rise in price, and would it be likely to last? The question whether there would be a reduction of output in exact proportion to the restriction of hours was now before the Departmental Committee. He would point out one great advantage of the work of the Committee. As a matter of fact public opinion had treated this question as in the nature of a "hardy annual." There were some well known Bills which came up year after year, sometimes they were read a second time and sometimes not, but until they arrived at a certain stage—the stage of being practically considered—those concerned did not trouble to put their houses in order so as to meet possible changes in the law. In this case hon. Members who supported the Bill said with great force that there would not be any rise in price, because owing to improvements in mechanical haulage in raising coal, in the better organisation of collieries, and so forth, it would be possible to make up the deficiency. That was true, but the advantage of what they were doing through the Departmental Committee was that mine owners were to be called upon to give evidence and to state their case, the Government having declared their intention to bring in a Bill dealing with the subject. Therefore, the mine owners all over the country would have to consider the best practical methods by which to meet the decrease in the output of coal, so that there might be as little difference in the output and in the price as possible in the circumstances. Then there was the question of exemptions. Were they going to make any exemptions? Let them take the case of old collieries where the distance to the face was very great. There were old mines which had been working for a hundred years and more, which gave employment to between forty and 100 men. Did they propose to make any exception as to those? What did they propose to do in the case of an accident which interfered with the enforcement of the eight hours day? Were they going to take any notice of the seasonal trade? He was informed that in the Cannock Chase district, where the business of the pits was chiefly in house coal, during the summer months the pits were working three and four days a week, and the men looked for special conditions in the winter in order to average the general wage of the year. Were they going to make any exception in the case of a district like that? Again, if ten hours were needed for the winding of coal in a particular pit, were the persons engaged on the roads or in winding not to be allowed to work underground more than eight hours? If not, there would be a great restriction of output. These were points which had to be taken into consideration. He absolutely declined to admit that any Home Secretary could settle them before the House in Committee, or in a Committee upstairs. The Bill made no attempt to deal with one important matter which was distinct from the work of the Committee. Hon. Members had not said what they proposed in regard to the enforcement of the provisions of the Bill. Who was to be responsible for the record of men going down the mine and coming up? Were the miners or the owners to be fined for contraventions of the law? It was hardly fair to leave all these important points to be worked out, not by those who were responsible for the Bill, but by the Government when they took it up. His hon. friends might say what they liked, these were matters which must be settled before the Government put their skilled experts to draft a measure. He thanked the House for listening to him with so much patience. He regretted the delay that had occurred. It was due to the fact that they were getting the necessary information, but he could assure the House that the Government had not, and never had had, the slightest intention of playing fast and loose with any Member of the House interested in this matter. They were acting in the best interest of all those who had brought in the Bill. They were awaiting the Report of the Departmental Committee without which they could not put their hands to a Bill. He hoped the Committee would present their Report by Whitsuntide. As soon as they got that Report they would take the Bill in hand and have it introduced in the House. He did not think any reasonable man could ask them to do more in this second session of a new Parliament, when they were all struggling day by day to keep their heads above the mass of work which flowed in upon them from every side. Might he make an appeal to his hon. friends, even to those who were most specially responsible for this Bill, to remember that, as soon as the debate was over, the Government would be pressed to give facilities for other matters of equal or greater importance by other large combinations of Members. But in the case of a Government, as in the case of a coal mine, there was what might be called a working limit, and they cannot get out of a bottle more than the dimensions of the neck would allow. They undertook to do their best. Those who were interested in this Bill were aware that the Government itself was pledged to bring in an Eight Hours Bill. So far as he was concerned there would be no avoidable delay whatever in the carrying out of that promise.

*MR. RUSSELL REA (Gloucester) said that, as Chairman of the Departmental Committee, he recognised the fact that it would be entirely improper for him to interpose in this debate to discuss the merits of the question, but he had no hesitation in stating what the Committee was doing. After the Committee was appointed he consulted his colleagues as to the course which should be taken in the investigation of the question. He looked at the former debates on the subject, but he found himself no wiser with respect to certain matters on which information was essential. Then they went to the Departments. They found that the information at the Home Office was very scanty. When the Home Office had given the Committee a statement of the national output of coal, and that of each district, the number of men employed in the various districts, and of the number of boys under sixteen, they had given all the information they had. The Board of Trade told them how many days in the various months of the year collieries had been totally idle. That was all the information got from that Department. The Committee had been asked to give a statistical and economic Report on the effect of proposed legislative changes, and they had no data on which to base a Report which would be of any scientific value whatever, so that they had to begin the task of collecting information in their own way. The first step was to design and secure the issue by the Home Office of a series of forms to the collieries of the country for the purpose of obtaining what might be called a practical census. The Committee had to thank the owners and managers of collieries for the careful way in which they had responded to the request made to them for information. The Committee were now in possession of information as to the number of men employed in the mining industry, the rates of pay, the hours worked, and other matters. When the returns were received considerable labour was involved in the tabulation and arrangement of the facts in order to bring them into an intelligible form. At one time they had a dozen clerks working overtime—considerably over eight hours a day—dealing with the statistical returns. Then the Committee opened the inquiry to the public. He might say that the employers responded extremely well. They sent their best men, but even they were incapable of judging of the question until they got the result of the preliminary inquiry as a basis for the preparation of their evidence. This was not merely a statistical question. They had to consider it in its economical, physiological, psychological, and mechanical aspects. These were matters which came within the purview of the inquiry, and must be reported on. The Committee had not lost any time. They were appointed last summer and they at once began the preliminary investigations. They formulated their tables and sent them out. The hon. Member for Ince and his friends took six months to give the simple answer "No" to a question which was addressed to them. He wished to say that when the Committee were enabled to present there Report they would give to the House the materials for forming a broader opinion on all the questions involved in this matter than they could possibly possess without that Report. The Committee had considered the matter purely from the economic side, and politics had never entered into their inquiry.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said it was somewhat satisfactory to him to find that he was justified last year, when he had the opportunity of saying a few words on the Bill, in warning hon. Members below the gangway of the dangers they ran in not voting against the Government then, but by being satisfied with the appointment of a Committee. The hon. Member for Ince, in his excellent speech, had said that the Committee had been appointed with terms of reference so wide and vague that it might sit to the day of doom. The Committee had been appointed, in his opinion, solely for the purpose of providing the Government with arguments against the Bill instead of clearing away difficulties and facilitating its passage. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no."] Well, he had listened carefully to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and he had never heard a more damaging criticism of an Eight Hours Bill. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh, oh."] The whole of the right hon. Gentleman's argument centred round the effect an eight hours day would have upon the price of coal.

*MR. GLADSTONE said that that was not his argument. He had made a quotation from what had been said only as an illustration; but he had also said that he did not agree with the statement that a great advance in price was to be apprehended.

MR. COCHRANE said that the impression left on his mind, and on the minds of all other hon. Members near him, by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that the great difficulty the right hon. Gentleman saw in the way of this particular measure was that the future price of coal would be raised, and that that would affect our shipping trade. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no."]

*MR. GLADSTONE said that it was not fair to attribute that argument to him. What he had made perfectly clear was that it was an important matter for the consideration of the country at large, and it was necessary in justice to the interest of the consumers, large and small, to make inquiry into what truth there was in the allegation.

MR. COCHRANE said that, so far as he understood, it did not appear that what he had said conflicted with the right hon. Gentleman's statement. Did the right hon. Gentleman attach any weight to the price of coal or not? He must have meant something by alluding to it. If the inquiry indicated that there would be a rise in price of coal, would the right hon. Gentleman then oppose the Bill?

*MR. GLADSTONE said he wanted to keep the hon. Member to what he had said. He denied that he had ever said anything of the kind imputed to him by the hon. Member.

MR. COCHRANE said he did not wish to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman. Possibly he had not understood what the Home Secretary intended to convey; but it certainly was his impression that the right hon. Gentleman had brought forward every argument which could be urged as to the difficulties in the way of the operation of an eight hours day, as to the difficulty of counting time from bank to bank, as to the difficulty of employing underground managers, and as to the difficulty of making exemptions. When the Workmen's Compensation Bill was under discussion there was no difficulty in making exceptions, and he ventured to say that if the right hon. Gentleman devoted his intelligence to the matter, all such questions could very well be considered and settled in Committee of the Whole House. It might be his density, but, notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman had said, he failed to apprehend what was the attitude of the Government towards the Bill. After having voted for the Second Reading, would they take effective steps to s nd it upstairs to a Grand Committee? The hon. Members below the gangway congratulated themselves in having got the hon. Member for Northumberland to join the angels; but he assured those hon. Members that what they needed was not the wisdom of the angels, but the wisdom of the serpent, especially when they were dealing with a Liberal Government, if they wanted this Bill to pass. The only way to get the Bill passed was by opposing the Liberal Government on every occasion.

MR. WALSH rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Frederick Banbury and Captain Craig.

Question "That this Bill be now read a second time," put accordingly, and agreed to.

MR. WALSH, in moving the reference of the Bill to the Standing Committee on Trade, said that the promoters felt positive that the House might leave the consideration of the details of the Bill with perfect confidence to the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc."

SIR FRANCIS POWELL hoped the House would not assent to the proposal. It was obvious that the Bill could not be carried through without the assistance and guidance of the Government, who themselves had a Departmental Committee sitting with a view to preparing a Bill of their own. Reference had been made to the Factory Act which had been sent to the Standing Committee on Trade; but that was a Government Bill, and it was in that state of things that the measure was so referred. As the very question raised by this Bill was before a Departmental Committee, he thought, before proceeding further, they should wait for the Report of that Committee. It seemed to him that for the House to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Trade, which must sit almost immediately, would, under the circumstances, be inadvisable.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) who spoke amidst cries of "Divide," said hon. Members had half an hour in which to divide. He was surprised, after the speech of the Home Secretary, that the Government appeared to be willing to accept the Motion which had been made by the hon. Gentleman below the gangway. The Home Secretary, indeed, made a very good case against sending the Bill to the Committee on Trade at all, and defended the appointment of the Departmental Committee on the ground that it was necessary to get a certain amount of information which was not in the possession of the Home Office or of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had shown that very important information relating to the details of the Bill and its proper working was not in the possession of the Government or of the hon. Members who moved and seconded the Bill. That statement was not challenged by those hon. Members. Then the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out, in perfectly clear language, that it would be impossible for any Home Secretary, however able, to conduct this Bill in the Committee, because there were so many additional details which would have to be put into it for which it would not afford the proper framework. The right hon. Gentleman had said that a great number of clauses would have to be added to the Bill. Were they going again to go through the farce which they had in regard to the Land Tenure Bill? They on that side allowed the Land Tenure Bill to go through, and when it came back to the House clauses were drafted and alterations made which had to be pencilled on the knees of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General. That was a thing he had never seen before in the fifteen years that he had been in the House. There was no excuse for sending a badly drafted Bill like this to the Committee on Trade. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, before they drafted a Bill they must know what they were going to do. The Departmental Committee was not appointed for the purpose of drawing up a Bill, but for the purpose of assisting the Home Secretary to draw up a good Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman had said that the Committee would report in a month's time and that the Government would, on the Report of that Committee, draft a proper Bill. Under these circumstances how could the Government approve of this Bill going to a Grand Committee? Unless they contemplated that the whole of the time of the Committee would be wasted what was the use of sending the Bill to them? The Government had pledged themselves to introduce a Bill of their own. There could not be two Bills on the same subject in the same session—one of them must be dropped. Hon. Members, it seemed, were extremely anxious to have this Bill carried without considering what its effect would be upon the country; but it was important in the interests of hon. Gentlemen themselves, that they should have a measure which was properly considered and workable. Under these circumstances he hoped the Home Secretary would pluck up a little courage and stand by his own speech, which was a very excellent one from the point of view he was now urging.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs) said the hon. Baronet had, as usual, made a clear, emphatic, and eloquent speech in opposition to the further progress of this Bill. It was the usual speech which was made on all private Members' Bills, and even if they granted that there was some force in it, all that it meant was that the hon. Gentleman was strongly opposed to the Bill. For his part he saw no reason whatever why departure should be made in this case from the ordinary procedure. It would be very strange indeed if the Government, who were now endeavouring to persuade the House to take this course with all Bills, were to step in to help in hindering this Bill from going upstairs. If the Committee found that the Bill was so poor a foundation that they could not build upon it, they could send it back in such a shape as to convey to the House that it did not afford good groundwork for legislation. The Committee might take any course they liked. They might refuse to proceed with it.

*Sir FRANCIS POWELL inquired whether the right hon. Gentleman really meant that a Standing Committee could refuse to proceed with a Bill referred to it by the House.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that they could not in a technical sense refuse, but they could send it back to the House in such a way as to convey to the House that it was not a suitable ground on which to build legislation. Another thing they could do was to suspend the proceedings on the Bill until the Government Bill was introduced, and then have the Government Bill before them and consider it also. But let the House take the usual course. Let the Bill go upstairs so that not only its details should be considered, but all the possible Amendments to it, with a view to new conditions and modifications being brought forward. That was the ordinary and straightforward course, and it was the course which the Government would recommend.

Mr. LAMBTON asked whether the Bill was to go upstairs merely for the purpose of making room for a fresh Government Bill? If that was the course the Government were going to take under the amended rules of procedure it might lead to great confusion.

Sir CHRISTOPHER FURNESS (Hartlepool) said that he was a Member of the Grand Committee on Trade, and anxious to arrive at a wise conclusion on this subject. He desired to know whether this Bill would seriously affect a large number of our industries, and for that purpose it was important that he should study the Report of the Committee which was considering the subject. Until that Committee had made its Report he could not regard himself as competent to vote on the Bill if it were sent to the Grand Committee on Trade.

*Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) objected to referring the Bill to the Grand Committee, not, like the previous speaker, because he was a Member of the Committee, but because he was not a Member of the Committee. He was a mining engineer and had been interested in this subject all his life, but when the matter came up for consideration he would have no opportunity of saying anything. Therefore, he supported the hon. Member who had just sat down, but for a different reason from that which he had given.

Question put.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle), in rising to move the Second Reading of the Sweated Industries Bill, said he thought it was a great misfortune that, as it was nearly five o'clock, there would be no real opportunity of discussing the measure. But he was sure that there was such a consensus of opinion in favour of something being done to mitigate the evils of sweating that it was a most unfortunate thing that such should be the case. The Bill, he admitted, introduced, so far as this country was concerned, a new principle for dealing with what was acknowledged to be a very serious, if not a menacing, condition of things to the industrial life of the country. The Bill proposed to deal with the evil by scheduling a limited number of trades in which it was known that sweating existed in an extraordinary degree. To begin with, the schedule of the Bill contained the tailoring trade, the dressmaking trade, and the trades which included the making, trimming, and altering of shirts. It was proposed to set up a Wages Board, consisting of equal numbers of employers and employed, which would have power to fix a minimum rate of wages, which, for the time being, should govern the work in those particular trades. The principle of fixing a minimum rate of wage was not a new principle. It was known to some of them who were connected with large organisations of labour, but there it was done upon a voluntary basis. The new principle was that it was proposed to give the Board, by statutory authority, power to fix a minimum wage.

And, it being Five o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Expenditure on Law and Justice in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the total sum provided in the Estimates for Law and Justice is £2,454,886 for the United Kingdom and England, £2,405,374 for Ireland, with one-tenth the population, and £388,699 for Scotland, with a population equal to that of Ireland; that the total cost of local government is £284,884 for England, £102,524 for Ireland, and £18,359 for Scotland; that the Departments of the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary for Ireland cost £83,084, and that of the Secretary for Scotland £42,792; that the office of the Registrar-General costs £9,062 in Scotland and £17,543 in Ireland; that the Board of Agriculture for England receives £199,633, and the Department of Agriculture for Ireland £238,979 a year; and whether, in view of complaints of the scale of expenditure in other Government Departments in Ireland, he proposes to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The figures quoted in the Question would require much adjustment before they could be made the basis of comparison. For instance, in Ireland the cost of police is borne on the Votes of Parliament, while in Great Britain it is paid for out of local funds; many of the services borne upon the Vote for the Department of Agriculture, &c., Ireland, in the case of England form a charge on the Vote for Education, and, similarly, the Vote for the Lord-Lieutenant has to bear expenditure of a kind met in England out of the Civil List, and entirely unlike anything that is provided for in the Vote for the Secretary of Scotland. These are examples only, but there are many respects in which the sums set down for comparison do not represent analogous services. I do not know whether the hon. Member's object is to suggest a reduction of the voted provision for Ireland, but in any case I do not consider a discussion of this kind suitable for treatment by Question and Answer.

Morality of Chinese on the Rand.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office has any Report regarding the morality of the Chinese upon the Rand other than that of Mr. Bucknill, the publication of which is undesirable; and whether he can see his way to obtain from the Transvaal Government any such Report from the Rand Free Church Council, which is stated upon the authority of the Right Reverend J. T. M'Clure, D.D., Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of South Africa, to have found, presumably after inquiry, that the morality of such Chinamen is superior to that of the Kaffirs.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Secretary of State has no further Report on the subject of Chinese morality, but the subject will no doubt engage the attention of the Transvaal Ministry.

Expenditure on Police in England and Wales.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state the total amounts received and expended by local authorities in England and Wales on police during the last financial year, including grants from Parliament or Local Taxation Accounts, and the rate per head of the population as enumerated at the 1901 Census.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Taking the financial year 1905–6 for the Metropolitan Police, and for other police forces the nearest year for which their accounts are made up, the Answer is—

Cost per head of population according to 1901 Census		3	6¼

Simon's Bay Dockyard.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what was the total sum reserved for contingencies in the original estimate of the Simon's Bay dockyard extension; and what are the nature and cost of the buildings which the Admiralty now proposes to abandon.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The total sum reserved for contingencies in the original estimate of the Simon's Bay dockyard extension was £369,000. The erection of buildings of the nature of coal sheds, workshops and stores, estimated to cost about £100,000, has been deferred for the present.

Expenditure on Naval Shooting Prizes.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what has been the net expenditure during the last three years on prizes for shooting in the Navy.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The expenditure on prizes for good shooting to petty officers, seamen, boys and marines during the three financial years immediately preceding 1906–7 (for which the figures are not yet available) was as follows:—

Navy—Special Service Vessels.

Mr. REES: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, and if no great trouble is occasioned by compliance, he will state the number of battleships, armoured cruisers, cruisers, and destroyers which belong to the class hitherto known as in special reserve, which are manned with reduced nucleus crews, and which are considered as about to fall obsolete, though still available for subsidiary purposes in war.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The hon. Member presumably refers to the special service vessels which are shown each month in the Navy List, and in the April issue will be found on page 270. They include ten battleships and seven cruisers, but no armoured cruisers or destroyers at present.

Pay of Customs Watchers.

Mr. BOWERMAN (Deptford): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that Customs watchers were paid at the rate of 8d. per hour for overtime work prior to the reorganisation of their class in 1896, and that 6d. per hour for overtime work is being paid to a certain number of watchers who perform duties identical with those who are paid at the higher rate; whether he is aware that the rate of 8d. per hour was paid to the outdoor officers employed on the lockers' duties now performed by the watchers; that 8d. per hour is the overtime rate paid in the Post Office and other Government Departments to men receiving the same wages as Customs watchers, viz., 24s. per week; and whether he will consider the advisability of introducing a uniform rate of 8d. per hour for all overtime attendance given by Customs watchers.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The class of Customs watchers was instituted, not reorganised, in 1896. The rate of overtime pay allowed to permanent labourers (the first appointees to the watcher class) was 8d. an hour, but they were not entitled to overtime pay until after a service of seventy-two hours in a week. The rate of overtime pay for watchers is 6d. an hour, but it is allowed after a service of forty-eight hours in a week. A certain number of watchers appointed to the post from that of permanent labourer in 1900 were, however allowed to retain their old rate of overtime when employed at merchants' expense, but their number is decreasing and they will in time disappear. The overtime rate of 8d. an hour was formerly paid to outdoor officers who performed, when required, the lockers' duties now assigned to watchers, but when the out-door officers' duties were divided between assistants and watchers the overtime rates were fixed for the former at 1s. per hour as against 6d. for the watcher class. It is only in London that watchers are paid at the fixed rate of 24s. per week. At the out-ports (including Tilbury, Gravesend, and Queenborough) the rate is 21s. per week, one-fourth of the total number of watchers being allowed to proceed to 24s. by annual increments of 1s. per week. The Board of Customs do not recommend the introduction of a uniform rate of 8d. an hour for overtime in the case of watchers.

Mr. MONTGOMERY (Somersetshire, Bridgwater): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that Mr. Charles Hill, of Spaxton, near Bridgwater, has been twice refused exemption by the Bridgwater petty sessional magistrates under the Vaccination Acts; that in October, 1906, an order was made by the same magistrate directing him to have his child vaccinated and to pay 8s. 6d. for costs; that these he paid; that recently he was again prosecuted for disobedience to that order, and that although the justices have been advised by the Home Office that in such cases they may use their discretion, Hill was fined 12s. 6d. and costs; and whether, as Hill has no furniture upon which distraint could be levied and will eventually be committed to gaol, he will, under the circumstances, remit the fine.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The case has not previously been brought to my notice, but I will make inquiry and let the hon. Member know the result.

Income Tax—Unassessed Duty recovered by Inland Revenue Department.

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is possible to give information to the House as to the amount of duty which, having escaped Income Tax assessment, has been subsequently recovered by the Inland Revenue Department.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The unassessed duty recovered by the Inland Revenue Department in the year 1905–6 amounted to £401,323.

Cost of Irish Police.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the total cost in the last financial year of the Irish police, including the Dublin Metropolitan Police, and the rate per head of the Irish population as enumerated at the 1901 Census.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The net cost of the Royal Irish Constabulary for the year 1905–6, as borne upon the Votes, was £1,319,852, and the cost to local authorities was £22,908 (Belfast £20,347, Londonderry £1,134, Counties for extra police £1,427). The net cost of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, as borne upon the Votes (excluding £5,209, the average annual net cost of the Dublin Metropolitan Police Courts Establishment) was £102,131, and the cost to local authorities was £42,446. The total cost, therefore, was £1,487,337, namely £1,421,983 borne by the State and £65,354 by local authorities, and the total cost is equivalent to 6s. 8d. per head of the population as shown by the Census of 1901.

Irish School Teachers and Public Meetings.

Mr. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the principal teacher of the Ballymote national school, county Sligo, was recently fined £5 by the Commissioners of National Education for making a speech at a meeting in connection with education at Ballaghadereen, county Sligo; and, if so, whether he will state the nature of the observations made by the teacher to which exception was taken by the Commissioners.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they have fined this teacher £5 in respect of a speech made by him at Sligo, on October 27th, 1906, and have warned him that any repetition of such conduct would lead to his instant dismissal. The Commissioners have forwarded to me a newspaper report of the speech, from which it appears that the teacher imputed improper motives to the majority of the Commissioners and to many of their inspectors in regard to the dismissal of teachers for inefficiency.

Irish Education Grants.

Mr. LONSDALE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a Resolution passed by the general synod of the Church of Ireland, on 10th April, expressing the opinion that the Government should, by supplemental Estimate or otherwise, bring the grants for education in Ireland up to a level with those for England and Scotland; and whether he will press this matter upon the consideration of the Treasury.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) My attention has been called to the Resolution referred to. The question of obtaining additional funds for primary education in Ireland is constantly before the Irish Government.

Arrears of Rent on the Blennerhassett Estate.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, although negotiations for the purchase of the Arthur Blennerhassett estate, near Killorglin, have been opened, a wholesale issue of civil bills for arrears of rent has been made; and whether, in view of the increase in the rents made since 1877, he will use his influence to have these proceedings stayed in order that purchase negotiations may be concluded.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that purchase agreements in respect of the Ballyseedy portion of this estate have been lodged with them, but that no proceedings in respect of the Killorglin portion of the estate have been instituted before them, and they have no knowledge of any negotiations for the purchase of that part of the estate which may be proceeding. I will ask the Commissioners to consider whether the case is one in which they might, with advantage, offer their services as conciliators under Section 8 of the Lord-Lieutenant's regulations.

Value of Volunteer Drill Halls and Ranges.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the estimated capital value of the buildings, drill halls, and ranges, belonging to the Volunteer forces.

(b) Vested in trustees, etc. - - -	92,000

Transfer of Volunteer Liabilities from Public Works Loan Board to War Office.

Mr. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he has obtained the consent of Volunteer regiments that their financial liabilities should be transferred from the Public Works Loan Commissioners to the War Office.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The consent of the Volunteer corps was not obtained because it was not in any way necessary. The mortgage deeds mortgage the property to the Public Works Loan Board or to its assignees.

Appointment to Postmastership of Birr.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Postmaster-General whether Mr. C. A. Simon, overseer, Southport, has been appointed postmaster of Birr; how many applications were received from Post Office officials serving in Ireland for this position; what is the length of Mr. Simon's service in the Post Office; what is the length of service of each of the unsuccessful applicants in Ireland; whether all, or nearly all, of the applicants in Ireland were possessed of proficiency certificates in postal and telegraph duties; and whether he will explain in what way

Mr. Simon's qualifications for this postmastership were superior to those of any, or of all, of the applicants in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Yes, Mr. C. A. Simon, overseer, Southport, has been appointed postmaster of Birr. In my Answer to the hon. Member's Question of 20th March I indicated my reasons for selecting Mr. Simon, and I have nothing to add to that Answer. It is not customary to publish particulars of the applications received.

Promotion of Irish Postal Officials.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will state the length of service of each of the four Post Office officials in Ireland who during the year 1906 were promoted or transferred to postmasterships or salaried sub-postmasterships in Great Britain, the length of service of each of the two Post Office officials in Great Britain who during the year 1906 were promoted or transferred to similar posts in Ireland, and the annual salary or wages of each of the six immediately prior to and subsequent to such promotion or transfer.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) It is not usual to publish such particulars as those asked for by the hon. Member, nor do I see that any good purpose would be served by so doing.

Irish Postal Order Business.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether, seeing that the British postal orders paid in Ireland amount approximately to less than 5 per cent. of the total orders paid there, and vice versa, and that it would be more economical to have all the details of Irish postal order work checked in Ireland, he will consider the advisability of issuing Irish orders with a separate series of numbers and a distinctive colour in the printing, and have all the details checked in Dublin instead of in London, as at present.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am not able to confirm the figure given by the hon. Member, and I am not aware upon what he bases it. The issue of a separate series of postal orders for Ireland would considerably complicate the working of the system and interfere with its simplicity without securing any corresponding advantage.

Irish Postal Stores.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Postmaster-General whether, seeing that the value of engineering stores used in Ireland in 1905 amounted to £11,500, of which only £500 was spent in Ireland, that nearly all the other Post Office stores used in Ireland are imported from Great Britain; that the upkeep of the Irish portion of the Post Office Savings Bank in London costs approximately £30,000 a year, that the Savings Bank deposits and withdrawals in Ireland made through British deposits books amount approximately to only 1 per cent. of the total and vice versa, and that the present system is inconvenient to Irish depositors and less economical from a public point of view, he will consider the advisability of transferring to Dublin the Irish Savings Bank work which is now done in London.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am not able to confirm the hon. Member's figures so far as they relate to the Post Office Savings Bank. The question of transferring to Dublin the administration of the Irish business of the Savings Bank has been considered on several occasions, and it does not appear that there would be any economy in keeping the Irish Savings Bank accounts in Dublin. I may point out that any inconvenience that may be caused to Irish depositors by the present arrangement has been much diminished by the system of withdrawal on demand for sums not exceeding £1.

Postal Facilities in County Mayo.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that at Achill Sound and Mulrany Post Offices, County Mayo, there is only one post inwards and one outwards each weekday and none at all on Sundays, though at each there is a railway station, while at many smaller post offices in Mayo remote from railway stations there are two posts each way daily; that the limited mail train of the Midland Great Western Railway arrives at each of the stations, Achill Sound and Mulrany, daily, but carries no mails for them; and that the up limited mail leaves Achill Sound and Mulrany about mid-day and carries letters from more fortunate places to catch the evening mail boats from Dublin, but inhabitants of Achill Sound and Mulrany have to entrust their letters to the guard and ask him to post them when he reaches some place with better postal facilities; can he say why the mails from Achill and Mulrany are sent over 20 miles by road parallel to the railway on a one-horse car, although the railway has been open for traffic more than ten years; and will he endeavour to arrange more up-to-date postal facilities for Achill and Mulrany.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have called for a report on this subject, and on its receipt I will acquaint the hon. Member with the result.

Great Southern and Western Railway—Examinations for Clerkships.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade whether he is aware that in the examinations for clerkships on the Great Southern and Western Railway one of three languages, Latin, French, or German, is compulsory; and whether, as these subjects are not included in the curriculum of national or primary schools, he will ask the directors whether they will consider the advisability of modifying this regulation, and also of including Irish as one of the subjects which may be taken.

King's Bench Division Clerkships—Open Competitions.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether steps can now be taken to fill future vacancies in King's Bench Division clerkships by open competition; and whether those at present exercising the patronage have any objections to such an arrangement.

(Answered by Mr. Cherry.) The Lord Chancellor informs me that all appointments to junior clerkships in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland are made by open competition, except in cases in which existing rights of patronage have been preserved by statute to certain judges. The Lord Chancellor has consulted the two judges who still possess these statutory rights, and they have informed him that they do not consider it expedient, and will not consent, to make the change suggested in the Question.

Irish Stone for New College of Science, Dublin.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it has yet been decided that the new College of Science in Dublin will be constructed of Irish stone; whether he is aware that Irish stone, containing over 70 per cent. of silica and less than 2 per cent. of carbonate of lime, is available, whilst Portland stone contains only about 10 per cent. of silica and 80 per cent. of carbonate of lime, and that the Irish stone is free from flints and fossils; and whether, as the Irish stone is therefore better able to resist atmospheric changes and is more durable, he will see that it is used in the construction of the college.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I have nothing to add to the Answer given by my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education to a similar Question on the 7th November last.†

Mr. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will state if the Departmental Committee that inquired into the question of the employment of domestics in the Royal Navy has concluded its labours; and when it is probable that the decision of their Lordships in reference thereto will be made known.

Mr. BRAMSDON: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will state if the Ratings Committee appointed by their Lordships last year has yet made its Report; and when he hopes to make known such Committee's recommendations and their Lordships' decision thereon.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) Both Reports have been received, but I am not at present in a position to state when it will be possible to promulgate the Admiralty decision.

Issue of Stokehold Boots.

MR. BRAMSDON: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will state whether the stokehold boots have been found satisfactory in practice; and, whether it is possible for the issue to be made to each man personally annually, so as to avoid the unpleasant consequences which sometimes arise in the use of the boots by different men.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) These boots are not yet in general use, but they have been found quite satisfactory in the ships in which they have been tried. It has not been considered necessary so far to adopt the method of issue suggested by the hon. Member, and it is proposed to await further experience in the matter.

Children Emigrated to Canada.

MR. W. HOPE (Somersetshire, N.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of children emigrated to Canada by boards of guardians during 1906.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) During the year 1906 the Local Government Board issued orders authorising expenditure by boards of guardians in respect of the emigration to Canada of 441 orphan or deserted children. Expenditure in respect of the emigration to Canada of 255 other children was authorised during the year by orders relating to the emigration of persons with their families.

Boarded-out Poor Law Children.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford); To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of Poor Law children boarded out within and beyond the union at the date of the last Return.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The most recent Return relates to 1st January last. On that date 6,806 children were boarded out within the union and 1,853 beyond the union.

Nottingham University College — Constitution of Court of Governors.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): To ask the President of the Board of Education what is the constitution of the Court of Governors of Nottingham University College; and whether the Board of Education approved of the constitution of this body before the charter was granted.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The Charter provides that the Court of Governors shall consist of the President, the Vice-Presidents, and the Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of the City of Nottingham acting by the City Council. The Answer to the second paragraph is in the negative.

Rewards for Snake Killing in India.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India still offers rewards for killing snakes; and, if so, whether, in view of the effect of such expenditure in encouraging professional snake charmers to breed poisonous snakes for the sake of the reward, and that any otherwise unexplained death is generally returned as due to snake bite by the village registrar, and in view of the efforts being made by the Government of India to discover an antidote against the snake venom, he will consider the propriety of inviting that Government to save the money spent upon such rewards.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) Rewards for the destruction of snakes are not offered by the Government of India, but local Governments are authorised to offer them to such extent as they think fit. As the total amount thus spent from Government funds throughout India does not usually exceed £200 per annum, I do not think there is any occasion to interfere with this discretionary power.

Irish Evicted Tenants — Case of Mrs. E. Crawford of Mullaghgarrow.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if the Estates Commissioners have received a claim from Mrs. Eliza Crawford, of Mullaghgarrow, county Fermanagh, an evicted tenant, for restoration or provision of a new holding; and whether the Commissioners have yet made any decision on her claim.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The application referred to was only received by the Estates Commissioners on the 3rd instant. No decision has yet been made in the matter.

Irish Loan Fund Board Auditors.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Loan Fund Board of Ireland has been called to the fact that some of the loan societies have appointed relatives of directors as auditors; and whether, with a view to checking abuses, some qualification for auditors can be insisted upon, as well as the publication in a local newspaper of the annual statement of accounts.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Loan Fund Board are not aware that any loan fund society certified under 6 and 7 Vic., cap. 91, has appointed relatives of directors or any other persons as auditors. The only official having power to audit the accounts of such societies is the Loan Fund inspector appointed under the statute referred to.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the condition of the road from Parkmore to Red Bay, county Antrim; whether he is aware that the Midland Railway Company ascribe the failure to provide adequate motor connection with the railway to the bad condition of this road; whether the damage to the roadway is done by traction engines, the owners of which pay nothing to the repair or upkeep of the roads; whether he can state the annual cost of keeping this road in repair; and whether, having regard to the effect upon the development of Red Bay and Cushendall, the Local Government Board will say what steps, if any, can be taken to make the owners of the traction engines liable for the damage done to the roads.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Local Government Board inform me that the road in question has at times been in bad condition owing to the destructive traffic in iron ore from the Parkmore Mines to Red Bay Pier. This traffic is carried on partly by traction engines and partly by farmers' carts, the owners of which contribute nothing towards the cost, about £815 per annum, of maintaining the road beyond their ordinary contribution as ratepayers. As the law at present stands in Ireland, owners of traction engines cannot be made liable for damage done to roads. I have no information as to the second portion of the Question.

School Fees in Irish Model Schools.

Mr. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, what amount of money was paid in school fees through the central model schools in Dublin in the past year; how much was refunded to the teachers of these schools, and how the balance of the amount was distributed; and whether such distribution was by direction of the Treasury or the National Board of Education.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) School fees amounting to £257 19s. 10d. were received from the pupils attending the central model schools during the year ended 31st December, 1906. The entire amount of school fees received from the pupils of the Board's model schools during the year 1906 was distributed amongst the model school teachers according to rules sanctioned by the Treasury. These rules are set forth in the reply given to the Question of the hon. Member for South Belfast on 21st March, 1906.† The shares of the teachers of the central model schools for the year 1906 amounted in the aggregate to £136 18s. 3d.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Rosyth.

Major ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there is any intention of making an increase, in the near future, in the staff of men working at Rosyth dock, which now consists of nine men.

† See (4) Debates, cliv., 356.

I beg also to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the fact that from John o' Groats to Dover there is no dock able to take battleships of the "Dreadnought" class, he will consider the urgency of constructing a suitable dock at Rosyth without delay.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): A statement on the subject of both these Questions will be made in the course of the debate on Vote 10, which I anticipate will be taken at an early date.

Officers appointed from the Ranks.

MAJOR RENTON (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many officers were appointed from the ranks from 1st January, 1898, to 1st January, 1903, not including riding masters and quartermasters; and how many of these officers were serving in the Regular Army on 1st January, 1907.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The number of officers appointed from the ranks (exclusive of quartermasters and riding masters) to the Cavalry, Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, Infantry and Army Service Corps from 1st January, 1898, to 31st December, 1902, was 136, and the number serving on the 1st January, 1907, was 86.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): Do these figures include district officers of the Royal Artillery, and officers of the Coast Brigade Royal Engineers?

Appointments of Officers.

MAJOR RENTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many officers were appointed from 1st January, 1898, to 1st January, 1903, not including riding masters and quartermasters; and how many of these officers were serving in the Regular Army on 1st January, 1907.

MR. HALDANE: The number of officers (exclusive of quartermasters and riding masters) appointed to the Cavalry, Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, Infantry and Army Service Corps, including those appointed from the ranks, from the 1st January, 1898, to 31st December, 1902, was 6,082 and the number serving on 1st January, 1907, was 4,091.

Under-Age Recruits.

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of a soldier named Henry Hartney, No. 8,404, G Company, 2nd Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers, who was born on the 13th July, 1889, and enlisted before he was seventeen years of age, and to the fact that his widowed mother has claimed him on account of being under age, and has sent his baptismal certificate to the commanding officer when claiming his discharge; will he say what is the legal age for enlistment in the Regular Army; and whether, under the circumstances, this boy will be discharged and handed over to his mother.

MR. HALDANE: The age for enlistment in the Regular Forces is eighteen. The circumstances under which any individual having mis-stated his age on enlistment can obtain discharge are fully set forth in paragraph 1805 King's Regulations. The power of deciding these cases is vested in the local military authorities, with whose discretion I am not prepared to interfere.

MR. JOYCE: If the limit of age is eighteen and the baptismal lines of the recruit enlisted show that he is under seventeen, has the boy's parent or guardian power to secure his discharge?

MR. HALDANE. When the recruit is very young we do not hold him by his act, but when he is nearly the age we give certain powers of discretion to the commanding officer to say whether or not he shall be released.

MR. JOYCE: But why take advantage of fraud committed by persons who are considered infants by the law?

MR. HALDANE: It is not a case of taking advantage of fraud at all. It is not right that a youth should be enlisted at his own request, and then when he finds he does not like it claim his discharge on a technicality.

Mr. JOYCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman recommend the military authorities to discharge this boy and send him home to his widowed mother?

Volunteer Drill Halls and Rifle Ranges.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can give a general estimate of the total amount of capital liability incurred by Volunteer regiments in providing drill halls and rifle ranges; and what proportion of that liability had been paid off.

Mr. HALDANE: A general estimate of this amount may be formed from the following figures. In the Returns furnished by Volunteer Corps on the 31st March 1906 (the latest available) the estimated value of the property was as follows:—(a) Vested in officers commanding and successors £1,080,00; (b) vested in trustees, etc. £92,000. Of this some £65,000 was contributed by the Government in aid of rifle ranges. On that date there were mortgages on this property outstanding as follows:—(a) £526,000; (b) £17,000. The estimated value is in most cases based on the cost rather than on the commercial value, and I cannot pledge myself to the accuracy of the figures.

Woolwich Arsenal Discharges.

Mr. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will suspend the further discharge of men from Woolwich Arsenal until the Committee of Inquiry which has been appointed has reported.

Mr. HALDANE: I am afraid that it would not be practicable to adopt the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend. It will be imperative to carry out some discharges, and, while every endeavour is being made to reduce the number as much as possible, complete suspension of discharges could not be conceded.

Mr. ROWLANDS: Will the right hon. Gentleman hurry the inquiry?

Mr. HALDANE: It is being pushed on as rapidly as possible.

Captain CRAIG (Down, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman put down the Vote for the Ordnance Department prior to the discharge of these men, so that the House may have an opportunity of discussing the whole question?

Mr. HALDANE: That Question should be addressed to the Prime Minister.

Bombay Municipal Elections.

Sir J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to a letter addressed to the Bombay Government by three members of the Legislative Council, complaining of the interference by the commissioner of police and other officials in the Bombay municipal elections; and whether, looking to the Government of India Orders of 12th June 1902, which declare that officers of Government interfering with the free choice of elective bodies will be severely dealt with, and to the fact that the Bombay Government has declined to take action, he will cause inquiry to be made into the complaint of the three honourable members of Council.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Morley, Montrose Burghs): The letter to which the hon. Member refers has been privately brought to my notice. Officials are not prohibited from offering themselves as candidates at municipal elections, and if they do, it is obvious that they must canvass; but I am confident that if any instance is brought to the notice of the Government of Bombay in which a candidate has made improper use of his official position to influence votes, they will act entirely in the spirit of Lord Curzon's letter of 1902.

Lord Kitchener's Command.

Mr. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether Lord Kitchener has been offered and accepted an extension of his term as Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army.

Sir H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): At the same time may I ask the Secretary of State for India whether Lord Kitchener has been offered and has accepted an extension of his period of service as Commander-in-Chief in India.

MR. MORLEY: The duty of recommending for the office of Commander-in-Chief belongs to my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War. With the approval of my right hon. friend I addressed a preliminary inquiry to Lord Kitchener whether a further extension for two years would be agreeable to him, and expressing my own wish that he should accept. He has replied in the affirmative. My right hon. friend will take the proper steps in due course.

Mayo College.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether boys receiving their education at the Mayo College are to a great extent financed by the Imperial Government; and, if so, whether in regard to boys of the class concerned, there is any sufficient reason why they should be assisted from the public purse.

MR. MORLEY: The Government of India give an annual grant to the Mayo College, the cost of the foundation of which was met partly by contributions from the Rajputana Chiefs, partly by a Government grant. The attention of the Government of India has been called to the question of charging fees.

Australian State Premiers and the Colonial Conference.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will lay upon the Table the correspondence relating to the exclusion of the State Premiers of Australia from the Colonial Conference.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I refer the hon. and gallant Member to the correspondence printed in Cd. 3340.

SIR. WILLIAM BULL (Hammersmith): Is the correspondence complete?

MR. CHURCHILL was understood to reply in the affirmative.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): Are we on this side in possession of all the correspondence published in Australia in connection with this matter?

MR. CHURCHILL: I do not know, but if there has been any correspondence published in Australia and not yet published here and my attention is drawn to it, the documents shall be laid before the House.

Orange River Colony Constitution.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state what has occurred to delay the issue of the Letters Patent embodying the provisions of the Constitution for the Orange River Colony; whether a register of voters has been formed and a Boundary Commission appointed, as declared in his speech made in this House on the 17th December last;† and whether he adheres to the belief then expressed by him that the new Parliament of the Colony might assemble in Bloemfontein some time during the coming autumn.

MR. CHURCHILL: The preparation of the Letters Patent is being pressed on and they will issue in the course of the next few weeks. Thereupon the registration of voters and delimitation of constituencies for which all is in readiness will proceed. No change either in point of time or method has taken place in the policy of His Majesty's Government upon the Constitution of the Orange River Colony; and no delay that was not expected last December has occurred. I see no reason to doubt that the new Parliament of the Colony will assemble in Bloemfontein in the autumn according to the anticipation which I then expressed to the House.

Judicial Powers in Nairobi.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what punishment is the magistrate at Nairobi empowered to inflict on natives for insulting white women; and, in view of recent occurrences, is it proposed to add to his powers.

MR. CHURCHILL: Under Section 509 of the Indian Penal Code, which is in force in the East Africa Protectorate, an insult to the modesty of a women is punishable with imprisonment for one year and with a fine. The law, of course, applies irrespective of the colour or race of the offender. The Secretary of State is not aware that any offences against this law have recently occurred, and he does not see any reason to increase the penalty.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland) asked whether the alleged insult to a white women by natives consisted of language, gesture, or anything approaching personal insult or personal outrage?

MR. CHURCHILL said that from the information telegraphed the Secretary of State formed the impression that nothing in the nature of an insult to the modesty of the lady in question took place, but for the complete particulars they must wait until the account by mail arrived.

SIR C. HILL (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether prior to the occurrences which led to the imprisonment of Captain Grogan and others, the Colonial Office had received any representation from the Colonists' Association at Nairobi, alleging that the local authorities are powerless or unwilling to deal effectively with cases in which the white population are exposed to insult or danger from the coloured inhabitants; and, if so, what is the date of such representation, and what reply was sent to it.

MR. CHURCHILL: The only representation of the kind which has been received at the Colonial Office is in the address of the Colonists' Association to the then Secretary of State, dated the 23rd of August, 1905, in which representations were made as to the alleged danger of a native rebellion and it was recommended that white troops and police should be substituted for the existing native forces. In replying to this address the present Secretary of State, while welcoming the assistance of the white colonists in maintaining order and trusting that they would render such assistance by joining the Volunteer Reserve, expressed the opinion that the general substitution of white troops and police was impossible not only on account of their greater cost but also because at least they would be less suited to operations in the tropical parts of the Protectorate. At the same time the Secretary of State expressed his conviction that just treatment of the natives was the surest safeguard of the settlers, and that, if this were accorded, the settlers would have no cause to fear them.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): Was the memorial referred to the same as the joint petition to this House?

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot say until I have had an opportunity of perusing the documents.

Jamaica.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can make any statement in regard to the application for loan and grant to Jamaica.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): At the same time, may I ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to state what requests for the provision of financial assistance have been received by the Government from the Jamaican representatives now in England; and what assistance by grant or loan the Government propose to give.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has only during the last day or two had an opportunity of listening to the statement of the Archbishop of Jamaica, who has introduced a deputation from the Colony. The consideration of the case is not yet concluded.

Opium Traffic in Ceylon.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Singhalese people grew the poppy in Ceylon or used opium under their native kings, or during the Portuguese or Dutch rule, or until the middle of last century, when the British Government established licensed shops for the sale of opium in towns and villages; and whether, seeing that the importation of opium has increased from 1,000 lbs. in 1850 to 20,000 lbs. in 1905, and that the Buddhist High Priest, Sumangala, and the Singhalese representative on the Legislative Council, Mr. Obeyesekera, have appealed to the Government to close the licensed shops, His Majesty's Government will take steps to suppress the opium traffic in Ceylon.

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot undertake at this moment to dispute nor to confirm the facts which the hon. Member has assembled; but the increase of the imports of opium into Ceylon under British rule has already formed the subject of official inquiry and correspondence, and is engaging the serious attention of the Secretary of State.

Persian Customs Control.

MR. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has information to the effect that the Belgian Directors of Customs in Persia have been dismissed; and whether, if any fresh appointments of the like character are contemplated, he will endeavour to arrange that directors acceptable to this country and favourable to the development of its commerce are appointed in the Persian Gulf.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury; for Sir EDWARD GREY): The Minister of Customs in Persia, Monsieur Naus, and his Assistant, Monsieur Priem, have resigned. My right hon. friend has no information of the resignation or dismissal of any of the other Belgian Customs Officials in Persia, or of any contemplated change in the Belgian staff in the ports of the Persian Gulf.

Turkish Customs.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: On behalf of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Porte have yet been notified of the formal assent of Great Britain to the three per cent. increase in the Turkish Customs.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Answer is in the negative.

Duty on Chocolate.

SIR WILLIAM BULL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the extent to which manufactured chocolate is imported into this country; what is the amount derived by the Exchequer as the result of the protective duty; and whether he has any information as to the advantage such protective duty has been to British manufacturers.

MR. RUNCIMAN (for Mr. ASQUITH): Taking the figures for the five years from 1902 to 1906 inclusive, the average annual import into the United Kingdom of cocoa or chocolate ground, prepared, or in any way manufactured, and confectionery containing chocolate, has been 10,914,000 lbs., of which the average quantity entered for home consumption has been 10,307,000 lbs. The average total amount of duty received thereon was £85,340; but I am not prepared to say what proportion (if any) of this receipt results from the alleged protective character of the rates of duty, or to make an estimate of any advantage which may accrue to British manufacturers by reason of those rates.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) asked whether it was not a fact that the duty payable on raw cocoa was from 2s. 3d. to 8s. 6d. per cwt. less than the duty charged on the product of the same quantity of raw material imported in the manufactured form.

MR. RUNCIMAN said if that the right hon. Gentleman would put his Question on the Paper he would have the figures verified.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN further asked whether there could not be presented to the House the calculations on this subject made by the Chairman of the Board of Customs in October, 1904, for the information of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. RUNCIMAN replied that he would be glad to communicate this desire to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Financial Statements.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in presenting to the House the printed financial statement for 1907–8, in continuation of Paper 147 of Session 1906, he can see his way to exhibit the respective items of our Imperial revenue and expenditure in such manner that, while they make the facts clear as to the gross income and outgo of the postal and telegraph business, the gross figures of those businesses are not brought into the totals to make it appear that the national expenditure is much larger than is actually the case.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The rearrangement which my hon. friend suggests would not be a very convenient one, regard being had to the general form of the public accounts. Anyone wishing to readjust the figures in the manner suggested can readily do so upon the material furnished by the Return in its present form.

Death Duties.

CAPTAIN WARING (Banffshire): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Inland Revenue authorities have applied for the payment of Death Duties in cases where no duty was exigible, thereby putting unnecessary expense on trustees or executors in resisting these claims; and, if so, whether provision could be made for recouping trustees, executors, or others for any expense to which they may have been put in connection with such claims when ill-founded.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Such cases may sometimes occur with this or any other tax. But my information is that they are rare; and it does not seem to me to be desirable that any general provision should be made for conferring on trustees or others a title to claim reimbursement of expenses incurred in consequence. Where there are special circumstances the Board of Inland Revenue are ready to consider them.

Buxton Brewster Sessions.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at the Buxton brewster sessions on 9th February, when a provisional full licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors was granted to the secretary of the Buxton Garden Company, Limited, in respect of a building known as the Old Theatre; whether he is aware that the grant was made by a narrow majority of the justices, in the face of opposition from Buxton residents, including property owners and licensed victuallers; that certain of the justices voting for the grant were until recently shareholders in the Buxton Garden Company, Limited; whether the justices declared that there was no monopoly value in the licence for which payment should be made by the applicant; whether the chairman of the bench on this occasion ceased to be a member of the company the day before he adjudicated, having transferred his 127 shares in the company to the magistrates' clerk who acted as magistrates' clerk while the case was heard; whether another of the justices acting also ceased to be a member of the company the day before the application was heard, having transferred into the name of his wife the twenty-one shares he held in the company; whether these justices had taken part in the meeting of shareholders of the company at which the question of applying for a licence was discussed, and the chairman had, before the application was made, pronounced strongly in public in favour of the grant of the licence; and whether, under these circumstances, he will take steps to prevent the confirmation of the licence.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland): The Secretary of State asks me to say that he has no information as to this case, but he will make inquiries into the allegations contained in the Question. It cannot, however, in any event lie with him to take any action in regard to the confirmation of the licence. It is open to any person who opposed the grant and to no other person to oppose the confirmation.

*MR. LEIF JONES: If the statements in the Question are confirmed by the inquiries, will the attention of the Lord Chancellor be drawn to the action of these justices, who evidently formed a biassed tribunal?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: We must await the result of the inquiries before deciding upon the policy to be pursued.

Railway Company's Contributions to the London Municipal Society.

MR. TREVELYAN (York, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that the London and South Western Railway Company assisted in financing the London Municipal Society; whether he will make an inquiry into the extent and circumstances of the subscription; and whether he has yet decided what steps to take, by legislation or otherwise, to prevent the recurrence of subscriptions by companies created by Act of Parliament to associations which take an active part in contested elections.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I have received the following letter from the London and South Western Railway Company:—

"London and South Western Railway,
"General Manager's Office,
"Waterloo Station,
"London, S.E.
"12th April, 1907.

"Sir,

"With reference to your letter of the 9th instant, and to the question which Mr. Trevelyan proposes to ask the President of the Board of Trade in the House of Commons on Monday next the 15th instant, I would explain that this Company did contribute to the funds of the London Municipal Society in July, 1906, the sum of £100.

"In so doing, the Directors acted under the belief that the Municipal Reform movement was not connected in any way with Party, and entirely in the desire to assist a society whose object was to reduce the rates, which pressed very severely on railway companies, who are in the anomalous position of not having any voice in the election of those who make the rates.

"This Company has never subscribed to any association having a political object, and does not propose to do so.

"In order to show you the anxiety of the Directors to avoid, as far as possible, any political influence being exercised among their employees, or on their premises, I take the opportunity of sending you copy of a letter which was circulated prior to the last general election—following the course frequently adopted on previous occasions.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient Servant,
"CHARLES J. OWENS.

"The Assistant Secretary,
"(Railway Department),
"Board of Trade,
"7, Whitehall Gardens, S.W."

With regard to the last part of my hon. friend's Question, I am not yet in a position to make any statement, but the matter is receiving the careful attention of His Majesty's Government.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman read the other letter? [Cries of "No, no."]

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) asked whether in view of these disclosures and others of a similar nature, the right hon. Gentleman would consult with the Prime Minister with a view to annulling the recent London County Council election.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) asked whether it would be competent for a shipping company to give a subscription to a political Party which included shipping subsidies in their programme.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a purely hypothetical question.

Redditch Signalman's Duty.

MR. C. E. PRICE (Edinburgh, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many hours the signalman, John Canning, worked at Redditch on 1st April; how many trains passed his signal-box from the time he went on duty to the time he left; whether he received any assistance; what time was allowed for his meals; was he permitted to leave his box during the day; what wages he earned whilst on duty; and whether any allowance is made by the railway company to his wife during the illness of John Canning brought about by the strain of work.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am informed by the Midland Railway Company that the signalman in question was not on duty on the 1st April. He was on duty from 8 p.m. on Saturday the 30th March until 7 a.m. on the following morning, his usual Saturday night turn of duty, during which time twenty-four trains passed his cabin. No assistance was given during this period, nor could he leave his post, but there were ample intervals for meals between trains. This signalman is paid 23s. a week wages with an annual bonus of 50s. and during absence from duty through illness he receives 12s. a week from the Midland Railway Friendly Society to which the company contribute.

Merchant Shipping Bill.

Mr. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is his intention to deal with the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage Deduction for Propelling Power) Bill as if it were a Private Bill, necessitating appearance by counsel and agents of those opposed to the measure; and if he is aware that this will entail great expense on the opponents of the Bill.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: The matter to which my hon. friend refers is having my careful consideration in all its bearings, and I have asked gentlemen representative of the interests concerned to confer with me with regard to it. At the moment I am not in a position to make any definite statement as to the procedure I shall recommend to the House.

London Brighton and South Coast Railway—Lighting of Trains.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a second class carriage of the train leaving Pulborough at 12.3 p.m. on the 18th March was not lighted when passing through tunnels between that station and Victoria; and seeing that frequent complaints are made that the carriages of trains running between Pulborough and Victoria are not lighted during their passage through the tunnels, will he communicate with the railway company on the subject.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have communicated with the railway company in this matter and will inform my hon. friend of the result.

Imports of Dutiable Articles.

Mr. CHIOZZA MONEY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the value in 1906 of the total imports into the United Kingdom of all articles upon which revenue duties are now imposed from each of the self-governing Colonies.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: The total value of dutiable articles imported from each of the self-governing Colonies in 1906 was as follows:—Cape of Good Hope, £12,677; Natal, £4,187; Transvaal, £30; Australian Commonwealth, £106,537; New Zealand, £163; Canada, £15,368; Newfoundland and the Coast of Labrador, £289. These figures are classified according to the Colony from which the goods were consigned to the United Kingdom.

Lighting of the Devon and Cornish Coasts.

Mr. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the recent wrecks of the "Suevic" and the "Jebba" off the Devon and Cornish coasts, he will cause inquiry to be made into the sufficiency of the lighting arrangements in that neighbourhood with a view to the increased protection of shipping against disaster.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Any inquiry into the sufficiency of the lighting arrangements of the coasts of Devon and Cornwall would be a matter for the consideration of the Trinity House as the General Lighthouse Authority for England and Wales, and the Elder Brethren, whom I have consulted regarding the hon. Member's Question, inform me that in their opinion it would be premature and possibly prejudicial for them to express any opinion on the subject pending the formal investigations which will shortly be held into the casualties to the "Suevic" and "Jebba."

The Patents and Designs Bill.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will cause to be printed and circulated, before the Second Reading of the Patents Bill, a memorandum, similar to the memoranda circulated on other Government Bills this session, showing its effect on existing legislation.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have already made arrangements for a memorandum of the kind described by the noble Lord to be printed and circulated before the Second Reading of the Patents and Designs Bill.

Vaccination in Workhouses.

*Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if it is a practice for medical officers of workhouses to vaccinate every person entering those institutions at all ages, varying from three days up to eighty years; and what was the cost of vaccinations performed in workhouses during the year 1906.

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. John Burns, Battersea): So far as I am aware, there is no such practice as is referred to in the first part of the Question. The cost of vaccination in workhouses is not shown separately in the Returns, and I am not able to state what it is.

Mr. LUPTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry as to the practice?

Primary Vaccination.

*Mr. LUPTON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the Local Government Board Order of the 18th October, 1898, Third Schedule, Section No. 7, which states that in all ordinary cases of primary vaccination the public vaccinator must aim at producing four separate good-sized vesicles or groups of vesicles not less than half an inch from one another, and that the total area of vesiculation resulting from the vaccination should not be less than half a square inch, is still in force, or have the medical advisers of the Local Government Board come to the conclusion that there is no advantage in large vesiculation; and, if so, will he issue a fresh Order.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: The instruction in the Order is still in force, and the medical advisers of the Local Government Board do not recommend that it should be altered. They have not come to any conclusions in this matter opposed to the views expressed in paragraphs 294, 295 and 297 of the Final Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination.

*Mr. LUPTON: Is it not the fact that Dr. Copeland of the Local Government Board has stated that the formation of large marks or any marks is not essential to good vaccination, and that the marks are caused by organisms other than the vaccine microbe.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: I must not be held responsible for any medical opinion.

Kettering Urban Council and Phthisis.

Sir F. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has now received and considered the statement of the Kettering Urban Council and the Report of their medical officer in support of their resolution, under Section 7 of The Infectious Disease (Notification) Act, 1889, to apply that Act to phthisis; whether he is aware that this resolution was moved by a direct representative of labour, has the general assent of the working class in Kettering, and was passed unanimously by the council; whether he is aware that throughout the shoemaking towns the spread of the disease in the factories is specially dreaded, and that, while the sanitary arrangements of Kettering have reduced the deaths in Kettering from zymotic diseases to ·25 per thousand, there is an average of forty-nine deaths per annum from phthisis, or a mortality of 1·28 per thousand; and whether, having regard to these facts, he will now signify his approval of the resolution and allow compulsory notification of phthisis in this urban district area.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: I have received the statement of the District Council and the Report of the medical officer of health referred to. They have only reached me within the last few days, and they are now under consideration.

Compulsory Notification of Phthisis.

Sir F. CHANNING: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has obtained authoritative Reports of the working of the compulsory notification of phthisis, under the provisions of private Acts, in the county boroughs of Bolton and Sheffield; whether such Reports show the system to be working satisfactorily and without serious objection; whether he has obtained, from or through the Local Government Board for Scotland, Reports as to the working of compulsory notification of phthisis in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other Scottish towns in pursuance of orders approved by that Board on the express ground that phthisis is now regarded as infectious; and whether such Reports show that this system is working satisfactorily and without serious objection.

MR. JOHN BURNS: There have been statements in the Annual Reports of the Bolton and Sheffield medical officers of health on this subject, but I am not aware that any authoritative Reports have otherwise been made with regard to it. Nor have I received any Report from or through the Scottish Local Government Board as to the working of compulsory notification of phthisis in any towns in Scotland. Dr. Bulstrode, one of the Medical Inspectors of the Local Government Board, has, however, for some time past been engaged on an inquiry as to phthisis sanatoria in England and Wales, and incidentally he has acquired much information as to the working both of voluntary and of compulsory notification of pulmonary phthisis. This information he is embodying in a Report which is now in the Press.

Inspection of Dairies.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what was the number of the local authorities to which the tuberculosis circular of the Board of 11th March, 1899, adverting to the Report of the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis, and enclosing copies of model regulations for the control and inspection of dairies, was sent; and how many of such authorities have since made regulations or revised existing regulations in accordance with the views expressed by the Board in the circular.

I beg also to ask the President of the Local Government Board, in view of the possible danger to the public from the sale of tuberculous milk, if the Local Government Board have any power to compel a local authority, within the meaning of the Dairy, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, to make regulations for the inspection of cattle in dairies contemplated by Article 13 of the Order; and if there are any, and if so, how many, local authorities in England and Wales which up to the present have made no such regulations.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have no power to compel the making of regulations under Article 13 of the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, but regulations under the Article are in force in all except about 340 out of some 1,800 urban and rural districts. The precise figures will appear in a Return now in preparation which was moved for by my hon. friend the Member for the Brentford Division. The regulations usually contain an article as to the inspection of cattle in dairies. The Circular of 11th March, 1899, was sent to the councils of all urban and rural districts. Regulations under the Order have since been made by 906 of these councils, and they have generally been based on the model regulations issued by the Local Government Board.

Slaughtering of Animals.

*MR. G. GREENWOOD (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government will bring in legislation in order to carry out the unanimous recommendations of the Committee appointed by the Admiralty in 1904 to consider the humane slaughtering of animals.

MR. JOHN BURNS: My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. I will give consideration to the subject, but I cannot promise to introduce legislation with regard to it during the present session.

*MR. G. GREENWOOD: Will the Government give facilities for the Bill which has passed its Second Reading in another place, with the support of the President of the Board of Agriculture, to enable public authorities to establish public slaughter-houses?

MR. JOHN BURNS: I will consider that.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): If the right hon. Gentleman in view of the state of public business, feels it impossible to introduce legislation dealing with this subject, will he consider the desirability of issuing a circular to local bodies calling attention to the unanimous recommendations of this Committee, and of doing what he can by means of Departmental regulations?

MR. JOHN BURNS: I shall be pleased to consider that suggestion sympathetically, knowing that the hon. Gentleman has taken special interest in this matter. May I add that the Report with which his name is associated, has advanced the subject very much more than he may be disposed to think?

Canadian Postage Rates Reduction.

SIR WILLIAM HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the arrangement that he has been negotiating with the Dominion Government with reference to the postage on newspapers, magazines, and trade journals from this country to Canada has been brought to a conclusion; and if he can state what is the nature of the arrangement.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I am glad to say that I have been able to come to an arrangement with Mr. Lemieux, the Dominion Postmaster-General, by which the postage rates on newspapers, magazines, and trade journals going to Canada will be very materially reduced. Perhaps I need not trouble the House with the details of the arrangement, as a statement in regard to the matter will appear to-morrow morning. Substantially the effect of the arrangement is this: The present postal rate on the articles in question is approximately 4d. per pound, which will be reduced to 1d. per pound per packet. But a very substantial portion of the loss involved by the reduction of 3d. per pound will be borne by the Dominion Post Office and only a portion will therefore fall upon the British Post Office. The Dominion Government will relieve the British Post Office, and themselves bear the cost of ocean transit on the articles in question in ships under contract with Canada. This represents a relief to us, in respect of the matter conveyed on those ships, of a little over 2d. per pound. The arrangement just concluded will put this country in future in a more favourable postal position towards Canada in respect of newspapers, magazines, and trade journals than that occupied by any other country. We are sanguine that the reduction thus given, and the improved postal facilities granted, will lead to increased postal communications, and to the circulation on a large scale of British newspapers, magazines, and trade journals in Canada. I desire to state emphatically, however, that this particular postal concession is based partly on the consideration of the very special and peculiar position, geographical and otherwise, occupied by Canada, the result of which is that British newspapers, magazines, etc., have been unable to obtain a footing in Canada, and do not reach the Canadian citizen, and partly in consideration of the very material contribution to the cost made by Canada herself. This concession must not in any way be held to form a precedent for a reduction in other cases where similar conditions do not prevail. The arrangement, being experimental, is limited at first to four years. I hope to be able to bring the new rates into force on 1st May.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether trade catalogues and circulars will be included in the reduced rates? May I offer my congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman upon having arrived at this arrangement?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Perhaps it will be better if the right hon. Gentleman will wait to see the regulations about to be issued.

Woodlands St. Mary Post Office.

MR. MACKARNESS: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether it is the intention of the postal authorities to order the removal of the Woodlands St. Mary post office, in South Berks, from the central position it now occupies to a position on the extreme edge of the parish, which will involve many of the inhabitants walking upwards of two miles to reach it; and, if so, what are the reasons for the proposed change, and what steps will be taken to meet the inconvenience imposed upon the inhabitants, especially in regard to parcels and postal orders, by the proposed change.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: As I have explained to the hon. Member by letter in full detail, I believe that the proposed arrangements will be for the general convenience of the district.

Coigach (Ross-shire) Letter Deliveries.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he has received a petition from the inhabitants of the Coigach district, Achiltibuie, Ross-shire, urging that there should be a daily delivery of letters during the six months of the year from May to October; and will efforts be made to accede to the prayer of the petitioners.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I have received the petition referred to by the hon. Member, and I find that there is already a service on six days a week from Ullapool to Achiltibuie in the months of July, August and September. I regret that, owing to the high cost of the existing arrangements compared to the receipts, I should not be justified in affording, during the other three months, a more frequent service than that now given on three days a week. It is possible, however, that a delivery on six days would be justified in some part of the district served from Achiltibuie during the three summer months. I am making further inquiry on this point and will communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Endowments for Secondary Education.

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he would grant a Return showing the endowments available for secondary education which, under Part II. of the Education Bill of 1906, would not have been placed under public control, and also showing the amount of the endowments for national education which is now expended on the upkeep, including cost of buildings, of Eton, Winchester, and Harrow.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The Board of Education do not possess, and I do not think there is in existence, any authentic comprehensive list of endowments available in England and Wales for secondary education, whether those that would have been or those that would not have been exempt under Part II. of last year's Bill. I am, therefore, unable to give the information desired in the first paragraph of the Question, but the Board are making endeavours gradually to compile a list of such endowments. This will, however, be a long and laborious process. As regards the second paragraph, I will direct that a statement shall be furnished to the hon. Member giving, so far as is practicable, the information he desires in respect of that one of the three schools named in the Question, viz., Harrow, about which the Board possess information.

Elementary School Return.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he will issue a Return for 1906, similar to that made in 1900 [Cd. 315], showing, for each public elementary school inspected in England and Wales, the name and denomination of school, the accommodation, the average attendance, the annual grant paid, and particulars of school income and expenditure; and if he cannot give the Return for England will he give it for Wales only.

MR. MCKENNA: All the information which my hon. friend requires, with the exception of the Annual Grant paid and the particulars of school income and expenditure, will be found in the List of Public Elementary Schools in England and Wales on 1st January, 1906, issued by the Board of Education [Cd. 3182]. The grants are no longer paid to managers responsible for individual schools, but to local education authorities, and are not earmarked as sums to be spent upon the particular schools in respect of which they are paid. Moreover, the expenditure upon each individual school is not separated in the accounts of most authorities. I doubt, therefore, whether it would be possible to obtain the information in respect of either England or Wales, and I am certain the results would not justify the very large expenditure involved. I must also point out to my hon. friend that the conditions under which the Return was granted in 1900 have entirely changed owing to the passing of the Education Act, 1902.

MR. D. A. THOMAS: Have the Department no official information as to the application of the rates to various schools?

MR. MCKENNA: The information could be supplied in some cases but not in others.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any information as to those local authorities which do not make any payment out of the rates towards the support of schools?

MR. MCKENNA: No doubt the information could be obtained, but it would take a very long time.

MR. MCKENNA: Yes.

Royston School Teachership.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Education if he can state the exact educational grounds on which Mr. Milnes, formerly in the employ of the West Riding County Council, was rejected as a candidate for a teachership at Royston.

MR. MCKENNA: The jurisdiction of the Board of Education in this and similar cases is strictly limited to determining whether the local education authority withheld their consent on educational grounds. These grounds in the present case are of course within the knowledge of the Board, but it seems unnecessary and, in the interests of the teacher, undesirable to state publicly the precise educational reasons on which the local education authority grounded their decision that Mr. Milnes was unsuited for the post.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: The right hon. Gentleman the other day stated that he was aware of the grounds.

MR. MCKENNA: I have the grounds, and if the noble Lord wishes I will state them, but I think it undesirable.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: If I ask for them privately can I have them?

MR. MCKENNA: Oh, yes.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say the Board had no jurisdiction if the grounds were educational?

MR. MCKENNA: If educational grounds are alleged for the decision, and the Board are satisfied that the grounds are really educational, the Board has no further jurisdiction.

MR. LANE-FOX: Did the Board take any steps to inquire if the grounds were really educational?

MR. MCKENNA: Yes.

MR. LANE-FOX: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the ground on which the appointment was refused was absolutely inadequate and was based on entirely different——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is asking a number of Questions of some of which notice should be given.

Sharlston School.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether the Board's inspector reported favourably or otherwise on the Sharlston elementary school during Mr. Milnes' tenure of the mastership.

MR. MCKENNA: The reports on the teaching at the Sharlston school during Mr. Milnes' tenure of the head teachership have been satisfactory.

National Physical Laboratory.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Tamworth Division of Warwickshire, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will give a detailed Return of the receipts and expenditure of the National Physical Laboratory since its establishment; and if he will give instructions for a detailed balance sheet to be published annually in a form available to the Members of the House as distinct from the particulars at present published.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I have, with the consent of the Royal Society, directed that the accounts of the Laboratory since 1900 shall be laid forthwith, and that in future a copy of the accounts shall be laid annually.

British Museum Reading Room.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the closing of the reading room of the British Museum for six months for repainting, and of the fact that on foggy days books only actually inside the reading room are available because the rest of the galleries are not artificially lit, and as in winter the hours of the distribution of books from other parts of the building are necessarily very restricted, he will consider the desirability of lighting the other parts of the library by electricity.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I am informed that during the closing of the reading room the books on the shelves of the room have been removed from thence and are available for the readers, who are temporarily accommodated in other rooms of the library. It is not proposed to alter the present system of supply of books from other parts of the library. Readers can secure the use of such books late in the afternoon by giving notice earlier in the day; and on special emergencies such books can be, and are, supplied to readers without previous notice even though at some inconvenience to the staff. The trustees, who are responsible for the safety of the collections of the British Museum, state that they cannot consent to instal electric light throughout all the storage rooms and galleries of the library.

Court of Criminal Appeal.

MR. STANGER (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General whether he can now say when he intends to proceed with the Court of Criminal Appeal Bill.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir JOHN WALTON, Leeds, S.): I hope next Wednesday under the Ten Minutes Rule.

House of Commons Dinners—Vaccinated Veal.

MR. LUPTON: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Mid-Derbyshire, as Chairman of the Kitchen Committee, if he buys vaccinated veal for the House of Commons; and, if not, will he endeavour to purchase some if the price is moderate.

SIR J. A. JACOBY (Derbyshire, Mid.): No vaccinated veal is supplied to the House of Commons. I am informed that the veal that has the lymph taken from it is very dark in colour and on being cooked becomes quite black. I must decline to comply with the hon. Member's request.

Meat Inspection in Scotland.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will exercise the power contained in Section 8 of The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, by appointing a commissioner with practical experience in meat inspection, preferably a veterinary surgeon, in connection with the inquiry at present being conducted by Dr. Dittmar into the methods of meat inspection practised by the officers of the different local authorities.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The Board do not consider it necessary to associate another commissioner with Dr. Dittmar, whose inquiry will shortly be completed.

Paisley Licensing Authority.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if his attention has been drawn to the remarks made by Sheriff Darling Lyell in regard to the case at Paisley, where two of the local magistrates, one a joiner named M'Naughton and the other a plumber named Kilpatrick, reported on structural alterations necessary at a licensed house, and where the joiner who undertook the reconstruction of the premises was the very Mr. M'Naughton who, in his capacity as magistrate, had ordered the work to be done to his own satisfaction and that of his brother magistrates; and where not only was this so, but the plumber who contracted to do the plumbing work to the orders of Mr. M'Naughton was the brother magistrate who also inspected, reported, and concurred in requiring this work to be done; and, having in view the foregoing facts, will he indicate what action he proposes to take in order to prevent the recurrence of such an incident.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am causing inquiries to be made on the matter referred to by the hon. Member, but they are not yet complete.

Mr. LEA: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate to the House the result of his inquiries?

Elgin Illegal Trawling Trial.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the statement of Mr. M'Ewan, the marine superintendent of the Scottish Fishery Board, on the 20th of March, at the trial of Appleyard, at Elgin, that he had reported trawlers in the Moray Firth of the following nationalities, German, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, in addition to Norwegians; and whether the master or any member of the crew of these vessels has been prosecuted.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am aware of the facts referred to by the hon. Member. Trawlers of foreign nationalities in addition to Norwegian have been reported for illegal trawling in the Moray Firth. In all cases when British subjects have been so engaged prosecutions will follow.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: May I ask whether any but Norwegian trawlers have been examined at all?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Yes, Sir, the authorities have satisfied themselves of the character of the foreign trawlers.

Mr. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): How is it possible in the case of German, Swedish or Danish trawlers for the authorities to make sure there are no British subjects aboard?

Mr. SINCLAIR: The authorities have sufficient means for the purpose.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: Is it not the fact that on board these foreign trawlers the first fisherman is always a British subject?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is not within my knowledge except in the case of Norwegian boats.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: Have there been any prosecutions except against Norwegian trawlers? Is it not the fact there have been none?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That may be so.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in view of the fact that on 20th March, at Elgin, Mr. M'Ewan, the marine superintendent of the Scottish Fishery Board, at the trial of Appleyard, first fisherman of the Norwegian trawler "Lucania," gave evidence that the vessel was British-owned, and that Appleyard was the responsible master, and that on this and other evidence he was convicted and sentenced to fourteen days imprisonment, he will make inquiries as to whether the "Lucania" is a properly registered Norwegian vessel and amenable to Norwegian law; and whether, at the time of the alleged offence against the Moray Firth by-laws, Appleyard was only temporarily in command, by permission of the Norwegian Consul, in consequence of the illness of the Norwegian master; and, if so, whether he will recommend that some change be made in the Moray Firth by-laws.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I do not deem it necessary to make inquiry as suggested by the hon. Member. If the facts regarding Appleyard be as stated no point of doubt will arise. As a British subject engaged in illegal trawling he is liable to prosecution. I do not propose to make any change in the by-laws.

Irish Land Purchase Repayments.

Mr. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, how many, of the purchasers of land, under the Purchase Acts of 1891 and 1896, have availed themselves of the power given by Section 2 of the Act of 1891 of paying their instalments and redeeming in whole or in part their annuities by transferring to the National Debt Commissioners, through the post office, guaranteed land stock instead of paying cash; and will he consider the advisability of calling the attention of purchasers to the fact that, at the present price of Guaranteed Land Stock (£85 to £86), they could obtain a reduction of almost 3s. in the pound on their instalments, or in redemption in whole or in part of their annuities.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): The Land Commission inform me that there has been no transaction of the nature referred to under Section 2 of the Act of 1891. The publicity given to the hon. and learned Member's Question will doubtless have the effect of calling the attention of tenant purchasers to the fact that, having regard to the present low price of Guaranteed Land Stock, a considerable advantage may be derived from the redemption of their annuities or the payment of their instalments in the manner provided by the section quoted.

Mr. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a purchaser of land, under the Purchase Acts of 1885 and 1887, who has obtained an advance of (say) £750 for the purchase of his holding, has to pay £30 a year for the first ten years, £27 a year for the second ten years, and £24 7s. 6d. for the last forty-nine years, while a purchaser under the Wyndham Act, obtaining the same advance, only pays £24 7s. 6d. for sixty-eight and a half years; that the difference, with interest at 2¾ per cent., amounts to £93 10s. 0d. to the disadvantage of the first purchaser; and will the Government consider the justice of assimilating the rates of repayment of the purchasers under the different Purchase Acts.

Mr. BIRRELL: The figures quoted in the Question are only approximately accurate. There is admittedly a difference in favour of a purchaser under the Act of 1903, in the total repayments made in respect of any given advance. This difference is due to the fact that under the Act of 1903 the rate of interest is 2¾ per cent., while under the former Acts it is 3½ per cent. I cannot hold out any hope of legislation for reducing the rate of interest payable under the former Acts.

Irish Government Return.

Mr. MOONEY (Newry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Return, Government Departments (Ireland), No. 8, House of Commons Papers, 1907, which was ordered by the House of Commons to be prepared on the 12th July, 1906, and which was presented on the 10th December, 1906, and ordered to be printed on 14th February, 1907, has not yet been issued; can he state the cause of this delay; and when the Return will be in the hands of Members.

Mr. BIRRELL: I am not responsible for the printing and circulation of Returns to Orders of this House. I have, however, ascertained that the Report to which the hon. Member refers has now been printed, and will be issued in the course of a day or two. The Return is a very voluminous one, and the printing and revision of proofs has of necessity occupied a considerable time.

Mr. MOONEY: Seeing that this Return was ordered nearly a year ago, and we were informed only a fortnight since that it was nearly ready, will the right hon. Gentleman see that we have it in a few days?

Mr. BIRRELL: I am not responsible for the printing of Returns, but I am told this will really be out in a day or two.

Irish Board of Agriculture.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the the working of the Board of Agriculture and Technical Instruction (Ireland) will be presented.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Chairman informs me that a meeting of the Committee is to be held on this day week for the purpose of considering the draft report. The Chairman is unable to name a precise date for the submission of the Report, but he assures me that it will be presented at the earliest possible date.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: Will the Report be ready for the discussion which is to take place on the 24th of this month?

MR. BIRRELL: I doubt very much that it will, but I am doing my best to expedite it. I do not much expect it before the end of the month.

Irish County Council Land Purchase Grants.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the fact that a letter has been received by the secretary of the Kildare County Council informing him that, owing to the loss on the land stock for the purchase of farms in the county of Kildare, the whole of the Probate Duty Grant, and a sum of £5,507 4s. 6d. from the Agricultural Grant, making a total of £8,464 12s. 9d., has been withheld from the county; whether he is aware that the rate for the current year, for county council purposes, was struck before this intimation was received; whether he is aware that this stoppage of £8,464 12s. 9d. means an increase of 1s. 6d. in the pound upon the rates of the county; why it was that two years' loss was allowed to accrue before any intimation was made to the council; will the council now be compelled to go to the labour and expense of striking a new rate and preparing fresh rate books and demand notes because of this delay on the part of the Treasury; and will he explain how these arrears have arisen, in view of the repeated assurances given to this House that there were little or no arrears as to the payment of purchase annuities, or are the Treasury charging to county finances in Ireland liabilities arising out of discount of Irish land stock, which discount was specifically intended and declared to be provided for from other sources.

MR. M'HUGH (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state, for the year ended 31st March 1907, the total amount of deductions made from grants to county councils in Ireland in recoupment of losses incurred by the Irish Land Commission under the Irish Land Acts of 1891 and 1903; is he aware that inconvenience is likely to result from the failure of the Local Government Board to furnish particulars of proposed stoppages before the preparation of rate estimates for the ensuing year; and will he direct the Local Government Board for Ireland to furnish county councils with such information as will enable them to check their accounts, and make provision for possible stoppages in future.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a letter has been received by the secretary of the County Council of Longford, informing him that, owing to the loss on land stock for the purchase of farms in county Longford, a sum of £1,200 was stopped out of the half-yearly Estate Duty and agricultural grants to the county; whether he is aware that the rate for the current year for county council purposes in county Longford was struck before this intimation was made, and the applotment of the rate, including the writing up of the rate books and filling of demand notes, is now practically done; whether he is aware that the stoppage of this £1,200 means an increase of 4d. in the pound upon the rates of the county; why it was that two years' loss was allowed to accrue before any intimation was made to the council; and will the council now be compelled to go to the labour and expense of striking a new rate and preparing fresh rate books and demand notes because of this delay on the part of the Treasury.

MR. BIRRELL: The deductions in respect of land purchase which were made from the grants paid last month to county councils in Ireland amounted to £73,218. These deductions were made by the Local Government Board in pursuance of certificates, under Treasury regulations, from the National Debt Commissioners and the Irish Land Commission. The total of £73,218 comprises £60,144 in respect of the present year, and £13,074 in respect of last year. By a clerical oversight in the Chief Secretary's Office, which is regretted, the certificates for last year were not forwarded to the Local Government Board in time for the deductions to be made from last year's payments, and hence have had to be included this year. It will be seen however, that the amount for last year is little more than one-sixth of the total, and the situation, therefore, is not seriously affected by the omission. The amounts deducted in the case of Kildare and Longford were £8,464 and £1,465 respectively, and these are equivalent to rates of about 6d. and 2¼d in the pound respectively. As to how the deficiencies certified by the National Debt Commissioners arose, I must refer hon. Members to the Secretary to the Treasury. I understand that only a comparatively small portion of the deficiency arises from arrears in the payment of tenant-purchasers' annuities, and that no permanent loss on this head need be anticipated, seeing that the counties are credited with the amounts deducted when the arrears have been paid. Such arrears, I understand, are invariably paid. For instance, more than one-half of the arrears which existed on 1st February in respect of annuities due on 1st December last have already been received and paid over to the National Debt Commissioners. It is a matter for regret that inconvenience should be caused to county councils which had already struck their rates in the expectation that grants of the usual amount would be received. The question whether it may be necessary to strike a fresh rate in any given county is one for the council to determine. In deciding that question it is desirable that the council should bear in mind the possibility of a further deduction to be made next year, in which case a very heavy rate might be necessary, if the present year's burden is not borne at once. I have represented to the Treasury the desirability of considering whether some amendment of the regulations or other change may not be devised so as to make it possible to give notice to the county councils of the deductions before the time for striking their rate arrives.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what proportion of the £73,000 is for arrears on the payment of the annuities?

MR. BIRRELL: Well, I cannot say, but it is a very small portion indeed.

MR. JOHN REDMOND; I would like Mr. Speaker, with your permission, to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can give the Answer which the right hon. Gentleman says he is not in a position to give, as to how this enormous deduction from the grants to local authorities has arisen in connection with the Act of 1903.

MR. RUNCIMAN: I am afraid I cannot on the spur of the moment. If the hon. Gentleman will put down a Question I will see.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I desire to know whether the Chief Secretary is aware that the instalment due by county Kildare in respect of land purchase amounts to only a few hundred pounds; and how, therefore, does it come to pass that there are deductions from the allowance due to the county of £8,000. I should also like to know whether the Irish Development Grant, which is ear-marked in the first instance, is still in existence or is it entirely exhausted?

MR. BIRRELL: The reason why Kildare has to bear this large sum is that under the Act the counties have to bear in proportion to the amount of land purchased and transferred, and the Duke of Leinster's property being in that county is the reason why it has to bear so much. It is done in proportion to the amount of transactions in the respective counties. If a county had no land purchase it would not be called upon in this way. As to the amount of the Development Grant, it is not yet completely exhausted, but I think you will find that under the provision of the Statute the obligation is placed upon the counties in the manner complained of. But when the Treasury comes to look into it you will find fresh regulations will be made to obviate anything of the kind.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I wish just to add one more sentence, for the matter is one of enormous importance—the deduction of £73,000 from this grant. I wish to ask the Treasury whether—inasmuch as we are told that this does not arise from non-payment by the tenants—it is not the flotation of stock, and is it not provided by the Act of Parliament that that loss is to be met by the Development Grant and otherwise, and whether those provisions of the Statute have been, as a matter of fact, over-ridden by some regulation of the Treasury of which we hear to-day for the first time?

MR. BIRRELL: My hon. friend (Mr. Runciman) knows that the loss did not arise from the flotation of stock.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: No; but the right hon. Gentleman knows what the cause is, and he is such a frank man that I am sure he will tell me.

MR. BIRRELL: I only know in part, and I certainly will not take the responsibility of appearing for the Treasury in this matter.

MR. LONSDALE asked how much of the Development Grant had been utilised in connection with the working of the Act.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Is it possible to put a stay upon the present quarter until the arrangements have been altered, and can the hon. Gentleman say, when these have been made, will they have a retrospective effect?

* MR. RUNCIMAN: It is quite impossible without notice to give an Answer to a highly technical Question. I can assure the hon. Member that the matter will have the fullest consideration, and that there will be no intention to withhold any part of the information.

Catholics and Irish Public Appointments.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that the bulk of salaries paid under the Board of Works in Ireland goes to the adherents of Episcopalianism; whether he is aware that of £36,493 so paid in a Catholic country only £9,793 goes to Catholics; whether he can explain how it is that, in appointments by competitive examination, Catholic candidates obtained more than half, and in appointments by nomination less than one-fifth; and whether he will investigate the matter with a view to preventing appointments by nomination from becoming a monopoly of a denomination forming barely a tenth of the population.

MR. RUNCIMAN: As I have already stated on more than one occasion, the Board of Works inform me that they have no information as to the religious beliefs of their employees. Appointments by nomination are made solely on the merits of the candidates, and no inquiry is made into their religion.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: If the appointments are made solely on merit can the hon. Gentleman explain how it is that while in competitive examinations the Catholic candidates obtain one half of the posts, in appointment by nomination they get less than one-fifth?

MR. RUNCIMAN: I can offer no explanation unless it is that more Catholics compete.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether a letter addressed by the Secretary of the Board of Works to the Civil Service Commissioners asking for an increase in the number of nominated appointments has been answered, and, if so, what was the reply?

MR. RUNCIMAN asked for notice of that Question.

Cost of Irish Postal Services.

MR. BARRIE: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what was the cost of the Post Office services in Ireland for 1895, 1900, and 1905; and what was the revenue from those services during the same years.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The information cannot be given for the Calendar years, but for the financial years ending on the 31st March, it is as follows:—

Year.	Expenditure.	Revenue.

Agricultural Holdings Act.

MR. W. HOPE (Somersetshire, N): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that a landowner in Somerset has sent to his tenants a new clause to be added to their agreements, the practical effect of which will be to cause them to contract themselves out of The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1906, and in the case of any tenant declining to sign the clause has given him notice to quit his holding; and whether the Government will take action to prevent the intention of Parliament being so evaded.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): The attention of my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture has been directed to this matter. In his opinion the clause to which my hon. friend refers is open to considerable objection and is likely, if pressed, to give rise to litigation. As I have already indicated, the working of the Act of last session will be carefully watched, and we shall be quite ready to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent its intention from being defeated.

London Chamber of Commerce and Tariff Reform.

MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that in a recent ballot in the London Chamber of Commerce, in which a majority of the members voting supported a resolution favouring Colonial Preference and Production, the majority of the Chamber declined to express any opinion whatever; whether the number of those supporting the resolution was one-third only of the total membership; and whether, in these circumstances, he will attach such importance to the resolution as it deserves.

* MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the decision was arrived at after a poll in which members could vote by proxy?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware. I have no doubt that my hon. friend's statement is in accordance with the facts, though I cannot say that I have verified it myself. I am quite prepared to attach to the resolution only such importance as it deserves.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman knew if an equal number of members of the Chamber had voted on any previous occasion.

Woolwich Arsenal Discharges.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if his attention has been called to the distress caused by the dismissal of employees, most of whom have been employed for many years in Government departments at Woolwich; if he is aware that the Colonial Office is recommending these artisans to emigrate; and if he will take steps to suspend the pending notices of discharge until some opportunity has been afforded Parliament for discussing this urgent matter.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am aware of the discharges to which the hon. Member refers, and I am afraid that further discharges are, as my right hon. friend the Secretary for War has stated to the House, inevitable, as there is not sufficient work to keep the present Arsenal staff in employment. I know nothing of the report as to the Colonial Office and emigration. Every step is being taken to supply the Arsenal with work from the Public Departments, and I can only express a hope that as the discharges are being effected at a time when there is an abundant demand for labour in the trades concerned, the workmen will speedily obtain employment elsewhere.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Is it a fact that a large number of skilled workmen are going to foreign countries to use their skill in the same trades as those in which they are at present employed?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think that arises out of the Question.

* MR. J. MACVEAGH: Wait till the bloody war comes that Craig has promised, and there will be lots of work in Woolwich.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE) (TERMINATION OF BUSINESS THEREON).

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs), in moving a Motion for the termination of the proceedings upon the Business of the House (Procedure), said he did not imagine that in any part of the House his action in putting down this Motion could have created surprise. One or two alterations in the Rules of Procedure had been introduced to expedite business, to facilitate legislation, to secure the better consideration of measures submitted to the House, and altogether to give better facilities and a better chance for the reforms which hon. Members desired. Everyone knew that the elements and possibilities which tended to hinder legislation were very great in that House, and perhaps a great many of those elements were not without their uses. The Government, however, were strongly of opinion that they were tremendous, and Members desired to have some change in the Rules in order to improve the character of the House as a legislative assembly. The Government proposed its first Rule. During the first three days of the consideration of the new Standing Order sixteen hours were spent upon it, and the progress made amounted to eight lines; and on Thursday last the whole day of seven hours was occupied and not one line or word was passed. The particular part of the Rule now under consideration was that which laid down certain exceptions to the Bills which were to go automatically to a Standing Committee. Hon. Members had put down a series of almost indiscriminate exceptions which really destroyed the main principle and intention of the clause. He had stated quite plainly that the idea of the Government was that, with the single exception of Money Bills, no measure should be excluded from the operation of the Order, but that it was not their intention to send out of the House Bills of a high Party character—great controversial measures. They did not see any advantage in attempting a definition, and, if the House were to go over all the subjects which individual Members might desire to see excluded from the Order, they might sit there almost indefinitely and never come to an end of the matter. In these circumstances, he had expected that hon. Members would not proceed with the Amendments of which they had given notice for adding to the number of excepted Bills, but they had done so, the Amendments being rejected by huge majorities. It became almost farcical to proceed with the Rule under this fire of Amendments—Amendments which, if carried, would have the effect of destroying the Rule. The Government offered an additional day for the consideration of the Rules, and he expected an arrangement would have been come to for the convenience of Members, the fact being recognised that a Rule supported as this Rule had been ought to pass. But that was refused. The Government thought the time had now come when they might have recourse to such a Motion as he had placed on the Paper. In moving a guillotine Resolution he could not do otherwise in a certain sense than apologise for it. He recognised that it was a rough, uncouth, and, in many respects, unfair way of forcing business forward. But there was no better instrument available. He hoped there would be a general agreement in favour of some day setting up a Committee of Business to which such a matter as this could be referred. He begged to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the proceedings on the Motions with respect to Business of the House (Procedure) shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday, the 16th day of April, in the following manner, and subject to the following provisions:—1. At 10 p.m. on that day, Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Amendment or other Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments or other Motions moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but on no other Amendment or Motion), and on any other Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings to be concluded; 2. On that day the proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House; 3. On that day no dilatory Motion, nor Motion for Adjournment under Standing Order No. 10, shall be received unless moved by a Minister of the Crown, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith without debate; 4. Any opposed Private Business which has been set down for consideration on that day shall stand adjourned without Question put until such other day as the Chairman of Ways and Means may determine."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the right hon. Gentleman, in the very brief explanation he had given of his policy, on this occasion had stated, and with perfect truth, that he made the Motion with reluctance. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman was sincere in expressing reluctance to make the Motion before the House, but he considered the justification which the right hon. Gentleman had offered to be of the most meagre and jejune description. Never before had it been suggested that Rules modifying the traditional methods of procedure should be forced through the House by means of closure by compartment. When the modification of the Rules was under consideration in 1902 no less than 17 days were occupied in discussing them——

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: How many Rules?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he would come to that in a moment. The debate on the Rules in 1902 lasted seventeen days. But inconvenient as that expenditure of time necessarily was to the Government of the day, it never occurred to them that they could possibly bring the discussion to an end by the forcible means of closure by compartments. The right hon. Gentleman interjected across the floor of the House, "How many Rules?" It was perfectly true, as he implied, that the number of Rules discussed in 1902 was larger than the number proposed to be discussed now But the right hon. Gentleman was only going to give them five days for their discussion. He noticed with surprise that the right hon. Gentleman himself appeared greatly to underestimate the complexity as well as the importance of the proposals which he had made to the House. It might be true, and he was bound to admit that it was true, that the proposals of 1902 were somewhat more complex than those which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to carry through by ten o'clock on Tuesday. But these proposals were not, as anyone who listened to the Prime Minister's speech would suppose, confined to the question of the Committee stage upstairs. They included some other propositions of most far-reaching importance, on which the right hon. Gentleman had not so far said a word. What was his alleged justification for the absolutely unprecedented course which he was asking the House to pursue? It was that they had reached a stage of the discussion when hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had the audacity to propose additions to the regulations which the right hon. Gentleman himself had made with regard to the Bills it was proposed to send upstairs. It might be that he thought some of their Amendments would destroy the efficacy of his Rule, and the right hon. Gentleman might perhaps make out a good case for that. But could any human being make out a case that to exclude from the provisions of this Rule Bills which effected great changes in the Constitution of the country would be to make exceptions of a kind which would destroy the efficacy of the Rule? It was preposterous to say so. The truth was that the right hon. Gentleman had greatly added to the difficulty of his task by using very ambiguous and obscure language with regard to these exceptions. He had told them that afternoon, and on previous occasions, that the procedure which he intended to substitute for the traditional procedure of the House would give a better chance of discussing all Bills, and improve the legislative machinery of the House. If that was really true, why was he going to except all Money Bills, Budget Bills and substantially all first-class Government measures from the purview of the Rule? Were they measures which ought to be imperfectly discussed? Were they measures to which it was improper to apply this improved machinery? No; everybody knew that the machinery was not an improvement. The whole action and policy of the Government showed that they did not think it even an improvement, but that it was absolutely necessary, or at any rate highly desirable, to enable the House to get through more work in the course of the session. [MINISTERIAL cheers.] Yes; but they could not have it both ways. Let the right hon. Gentleman be perfectly frank with the House and consistent with his own policy; let him admit that it was a misfortune to have to send Bills upstairs, but that it was a misfortune which they had to submit to if they were to do the whole of the legislative work he desired to see accomplished. The right hon. Gentleman was so fond of his Rule that he advanced in favour of it an argument which his own policy showed to be impossible and inconsistent with his scheme. It was because the right hon. Gentleman had held ambiguous and inconsistent language on this point that he had encouraged the Opposition to endeavour to increase the list of exceptions which he himself admitted ought to exist with regard to the general scope of his proposals. He said, then, that the Government had made their position with regard to this Rule more difficult by the fact that they had not held consistent language or unambiguous language in regard to the measures which were to be excepted. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, both in Committee upstairs and in his place in the House, had indicated his view very clearly; he did not believe that measures ought to be sent upstairs in the wholesale manner proposed by the Prime Minister. They did not know in the least what the Prime Minister meant to do with regard to the only Government measure which was at present in process of being discussed on Second Reading. They did not know what he meant to do about the Army Bill, and about other Bills promised, but which so far had not yet been read even a first time, or, as far as they had any reason to believe, got through the hands of the Government draftsmen. But he had a more serious complaint to make. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, had not understood or grasped the number of important questions which must be decided by the House before these Rules were passed. The right hon. Gentleman had actually, as he understood him, laid down the policy that as soon as the Government had declared that they intended to adhere to a particular line, as soon as they had laid down the scope of their own policy, then it became an impertinent waste of time for any Member of the Opposition to be sufficiently audacious to suggest the smallest change in the proposals laid down by the fiat of an omnipotent Government. It was perfectly true that the Government were omnipotent; it was perfectly true that they could force through these proposals in any shape they chose, however absurd or unworkable; but he had yet to learn that it was part of their duty to bow in humble submission to these exhibitions of arbitrary temper, or to withdraw their Amendments once the Government had announced officially that they did not mean to accept either those Amendments or any others of similar importance. No Opposition had ever accepted that rôle. The Opposition which the right hon. Gentleman led for many years with so much courage had never accepted it; he would be the last person to accept it, and the first to regard them as utterly unworthy of the functions thrown upon them if they obeyed the principle which he had laid down. Let him ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had clearly grasped the magnitude of the proposals which were still to be discussed before ten o'clock the following night—if this Rule was to be passed by ten o'clock the following night, he would not say discussed. In the first place, there was a question to which the Government ought to give more thought than they had done up to the present, and that was the publicity to be given to these Grand Committees. They had to consider whether eighty or ninety gentlemen were to exercise their immense powers and privileges in private, unknown to the public, and under the conditions which used to prevail in the bad old times before Parliamentary proceedings were reported. Another question of importance was whether these Grand Committees were to sit when the Whole House was sitting, and whether that would not throw an impossible burden upon the House as well as upon members of the Government. And then there was the important question of separatist and particularist Grand Committees for Wales and Scotland. It would be quite out of order if he were to discuss that proposal, the magnitude of which surely could not escape the attention of any Member of the House. They touched very nearly upon questions to which he would not now more closely refer; but one aspect of the matter he must deal with. What machinery were the Government proposing for deciding whether a Bill was Scottish or Welsh? Was it a small matter to ask Mr. Speaker to decide whether a Bill for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales was purely a Welsh Bill or not? It would be disastrous to hurry through before 10 o'clock the following day a discussion involving matters of this kind without hearing a word from the Government as to their policy. Was it a small matter that they were relieving the Chairman of Committees of his work in connection with the Committee stage of Bills in that House, and throwing that onerous duty on Mr. Speaker? That was a most serious proposal, and it required full discussion. He did not think that closure by compartments had ever before been suggested by any Minister on any subject where the House ought to have had a freer and a fuller opportunity for debate, and where less justification for the course being taken had been given. He thought the Prime Minister's method of dealing with the matter had been unfortunate. He had told the House he was going to make one concession to the Opposition by conceding the same freedom of discussion on the Report stage as they now possessed on the Committee stage of a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had not kept his promise in that matter. His statement was clear and explicit, and it was understood in the same sense on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy understood it exactly as they understood it, and he got up and protested against it; in fact, he took occasion to strain the rules of order in order to make a protest against what he understood was the Prime Minister's promise. The Prime Minister sat and listened to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy without suggesting that he had made a mistake, and it never occurred to anybody that the hon. Member had made a mistake. But upon looking at the Paper they found that the Prime Minister had translated that undertaking into language which broke the promise in every particular. If the Minister in charge of a Bill made a promise on one night and broke it on the next, the progress of public business was not likely to be facilitated; and, therefore, in one sense it might be fortunate for the Prime Minister that he had asked the House to continue this discussion under the fetters of a gag Resolution. They were, for the first time, asked to discuss, under guillotine proposals, revolutionary, and possibly beneficial, changes in the principles underlying the management of their business, although there had been no abuse of the Rules, and although the Opposition in opposing those changes had not exceeded what a minority ought to do, or what every minority, including that led by the Prime Minister, had in Parliamentary history invariably done.

*MR. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said he rose not to follow the right hon. Gentleman over the whole ground which he had covered, but to deal with his allusion to 1902, and to mention a few facts connected with what happened in 1902, when certain alterations were made in the Rules of Procedure by the then Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire, speaking in the debate the other evening, said that in 1902 the present Leader of the Opposition gave seventeen days, and it was now proposed to give only five days, and he exclaimed: "What an enormous disparity!" What were the proposals of 1902? Evidently the Leader of the Opposition felt that he was on rather tender ground, because he admitted that the proposals of 1902 were different from those now under consideration. It was quite obvious that in this matter there was between the two sides of the House a great gulf fixed. In 1904 the Leader of the Opposition told his followers that he did not mean to trouble them with much legislation, but the present Government meant to legislate, and that was the difference between them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said anything of the kind.

*MR. ELLIS said that if the right hon. Gentleman doubted his assertion he could give the words and when they were spoken. The proposals which the right hon. Gentleman in 1902 placed before the House occupied a good many pages of foolscap and dealt with twenty-four Rules of Procedure. It was quite true that they had seventeen days to discuss them, but there would have been no need to occupy that period if the debates had been conducted in a Parliamentary manner. Those rules were brought forward, then postponed, and afterwards brought up again, and they never knew where they were from one night to another. The present Standing Order Book showed that one of the orders at present stood without any ending at all; as the right hon. Gentleman once said, "It remained a torso;" and that was an illustration of the manner in which the whole thing was conducted and left. He was almost amazed at the right hon. Gentleman's effrontery. He did not use the word discourteously, but it amounted to that. The changes proposed in 1902 ranged over the Order of Debate, punitive proposals of a drastic character, the power of the Speaker to adjourn the House, sittings of the House, priority of business, private business, Standing Committees, Committee of Supply, proceedings on Report, the introduction of Bills and First Readings, the Second and Third Readings of Bills, withdrawal of clauses, money Resolutions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Surely all those matters were not discussed in the seventeen days?

MR. ELLIS said he was going to state what they did in the seventeen days. Those were the subjects dealt with by the proposals placed before the House by the late Prime Minister. The House dealt with a large number of those matters; some were agreed to, and some were adjourned, but they all involved discussion. Everyone was interlinked with the others, and they could hardly discuss propositions of that kind in the House without dovetailing one into another; that was to say, without referring to matters which were not specifically before the House at the moment. His proposition was that five days gave a superabundance of time for what the Prime Minister now proposed as compared with seventeen days for the matters he had detailed to the House. Moreover, the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman in 1902 did not come before the House after the labours of a Committee who had, as in this case, carried the proposals by considerable majorities. The right hon. Gentleman's proposals came of his own will, out of his own head. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, in regard to the time allowed for the discussion of the proposals now before the House would not hold water. There was no more Conservative Member of the House than himself in regard to Parliamentary procedure. He had been reluctantly driven to the conclusion that if the House was going to transact its business they must put in force the principle of the Committee of 1886—devolution. Hon. Members would find that there was much more reason for some of the Standing Orders now proposed than they might be inclined to think at first glance. However that might be, he was perfectly satisfied that, if Liberals meant to legislate and to do the reasonable work of the nation — he was not referring to the promises some people had made—they must delegate to and devolve on those Standing Committees a large number of Bills.

*Mr. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford) said that if the proposals brought forward by the Leader of the Opposition in 1902 were discussed for seventeen days, surely the proposals made by the Prime Minister should have more than two or three days discussion. He thought the Motion now before the House was calculated to cause surprise. On Thursday last the Prime Minister made the extraordinary statement that the Government had made up their minds that the Amendments of which notice had been given were not to be accepted, and that it was a misuse of Parliamentary time to move or to discuss any further Amendments. That was a delightful theory. Was that to be the system which was to prevail in the House in future? It seemed to him that it would make all discussion practically a farce. It would have the effect of making it perfectly superfluous to have discussion either in Committee of the Whole House or in the Grand Committees. It would be a very simple process. The Minister responsible for a Bill, or a proposal before the House, would get up at an early stage of the proceedings and say that the Government had determined that they could not accept any Amendment whatever, and that therefore the discussion might as well come to an end at once. When the Prime Minister made the extraordinary statement to which he had referred the Amendment under discussion was that Bills relating to the Army should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. That was a substantial Amendment and deserved a good deal of discussion. The House had important constitutional responsibilities with regard to the maintenance and discipline of the Army. The scheme of the Government was to send all Bills upstairs with certain exceptions. He maintained that the Government gave away their case by the exceptions they had already admitted. If the principle contained in the new Rules was a good one, it ought to be applied to all the business of the House.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not now discussing the Motion before the House. He is now discussing the procedure under the Resolution.

*Mr. ABEL SMITH said he bowed to the ruling and would reserve his remarks on the point for a future occasion. He thought that the Motion before the House, looking to the character of the Amendments which they would be prevented from discussing, was a high-handed proposal on the part of the Government. The time allowed for the discussion of the new Procedure Rules was wholly inadequate.

Mr. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.) said it could not be denied that the Prime Minister had justified the course which he had been obliged to adopt with, he was sure, great reluctance. Every section of the House suffered very materially from what had taken place. Those who had heard the dilatory Amendments which had been moved, and the dilatory talk of those who had moved them, could only come to the conclusion that the deliberate object of hon. Members opposite was merely to waste the time of the House. The Scottish Members would suffer most from the arrangement now proposed, and he suggested that, instead of the guillotine Motion applying in toto, as proposed, time should be apportioned to each Standing Order, so that at least the Scottish case, which was a most important matter, would not be disposed of without being discussed. No question of such magnitude, so far as Parliamentary procedure was concerned, had been before Scotland in the present generation. Mr. Gladstone, speaking in that House in 1888 on the Rules of Procedure, said—

> "I confess I am one of those who during the eight years I have been a Scottish Member—the last capacity in which I am likely to sit in this House—I mean the latest in point of time—I admit that I have felt the greatest difficulty before my assembled constituents in excusing myself and the House of Commons with reference to the handling of Scottish Business. I do not know what the experience of the hon. Member opposite has been; but I have excercised such ingenuity as either nature or practice has given me to make a decent and presentable apology to lay before the people of Scotland for the manner in which their Business—I will not say has been transacted—but let alone."

He strongly appealed to the Government to allow the Scottish representatives time to discuss this most important subject affecting the interests of Scotland.

SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said there was one point on which he agreed with the hon. Member for North Aberdeen, and that was as to the extreme importance of the proposals in regard to Scotland. He thought that it was little short of a Parliamentary scandal that those proposals, on which the opinions of the people of Scotland were diametrically opposed, might be passed without discussion. Under the Motion made by the Prime Minister for a time limit for discussing the new Rules of Procedure, it might be that those which were to apply to Scotland would be entirely pushed aside and carried absolutely sub silentio. Was that a method which ought to be approved by Scottish Members? Was that a proof of the great importance which they considered should be attached to proposals relating to legislation for Scotland? On the Notice Paper that day, there were from sixteen to eighteen Amendments put down against the proposals by supporters of the right hon. Gentleman. The Amendments put down by Members on the Opposition side of the House required adequate discussion, but they were not so numerous and they did not raise questions so important as those suggested from the Government side. In the Parliament of 1894–5 a somewhat similar proposal was brought forward by Sir George Trevelyan, who was then Secretary for Scotland; it, however, was to be only a Sessional, not a Standing Order; but under that proposal only very exceptional Bills were to be referred to a Scottish Standing Committee, and then by express Resolution, and not automatically. In the session of 1894 the discussion on that one Resolution occupied five days, although it was not nearly so important, or drastic, or intended fundamentally to interfere with the Parliamentary rights of Scotland. That Sessional Order was dropped in 1894. It was in 1895 renewed after two days discussion, and only in regard to a single Bill—the Scottish Local Government Bill. But that Bill was framed almost exactly on the same lines as the English Bill which occupied forty-two days of the time of Parliament in discussion, and there was every reason why the Scottish Bill should be discussed with no undue prolongation of debate. He did not think that any Scottish Member would say that the time was wasted in either of those years. It was to be remembered that the Amendments to the proposed Rules were to be guillotined at ten o'clock, and therefore they might be subsequently passed sub silentio.

SIR J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire) thought that the proposal made by the Prime Minister was generally approved by the people of Scotland. What they wanted in Scotland above all was a business way of carrying through the business of the country.

*MR. SPEAKER said that the hon. Member was anticipating discussion which might arise at a later stage. He must confine himself to the Motion now before the House.

SIR J. JARDINE said that all he wanted to submit was that he thought the feeling of the Scottish nation was well represented by the proposal now before the House.

MR. GEORGE FABER (York) said that this was clearly a case of chickens coming home to roost. Or, to put it in another way, the reckless I.O.U.'s which the present Government distributed during the general election were now coming in, and a demand was being made for them to be paid. He maintained that to press through these new Rules of Procedure, which were of immense moment, in the short space of time allotted was nothing short of an abuse of the Rules of the House. The comparison between the seventeen days allowed in 1902 by the late Prime Minister for discussion of the new Rules then proposed and the beggarly five days now to be given was very striking. The right hon. Member for Rushcliffe had admitted that the alterations made in 1902 were not greater or more important than those now proposed. Moreover, when, in 1902, seventeen days were given for discussion, there was no guillotine. If the present Government had pursued the same course as the Government of 1902, the matter would have come to a conclusion at a proper time. The Members on the Opposition side of the House had no desire to delay business, but they did not want to have their mouths closed by the gag and the guillotine.

Sir F. BANBURY (City of London) said that the right hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division had advanced two reasons for adopting this Resolution: first, that although it was true that the debates in 1902 had occupied seventeen days, the number of alterations was really very much larger than that now proposed; and secondly, that, though he regretted it very much, the Government had come to the conclusion that in order to facilitate the business of the House something of the sort was necessary. The right hon. Gentleman had added that the late Prime Minister had at one time stated that he was not desirous of passing legislation, whereas the present Government were desirous of legislation. It was quite true that the number of alterations in the Rules was in 1902 greater than was now proposed; but they could not always count the importance of alterations by numbers. For instance, one was that the House should meet at two o'clock instead of at three; another, that there should be a dinner hour from half-past seven to nine; and a third, that private Members' Bills should be taken on Fridays instead of on Wednesdays. All those alterations were made for the convenience of the House; but the Prime Minister was proposing alterations which limited the immemorial practice of having free discussion on the floor of the House. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman did not in his innermost heart believe in his own case. The next defence advanced was that in order to facilitate legislation something of this sort must be done. They had had three days and not five days as some hon. Members said, and at the end of those three days the right hon. Gentleman announced his intention of moving a guillotine Resolution. At any rate he might, like the late Government, have waited till the end of the seventeenth day before he did anything so startling. They were to be prevented from discussing Amendments, a restriction which was not necessary, as the debates up to that point had not been of a dilatory nature. After ten o'clock all Amendments were to be ruled out of order and not even put from the Chair, with the exception of Amendments proposed by the Government. That was to be done by trampling upon the rights of discussion and on the rights of the minority, on the ground that it was necessary to facilitate business. He would like with the permission of the House to read some pertinent remarks from a speech of the late Sir William Harcourt which seemed apposite to the present case. Speaking on 7th February, 1902, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"May I say one word upon a question to which I do not know that any particular rule applies, but upon which a great deal has been said, and which inspires, I think, a good deal of these changes, and that is the intolerance of debate and discussion in this House? I believe that that is founded upon a complete misconception of the function of the House of Commons. I have often heard Mr. Disraeli speak in private on this subject. He said—'I wonder whether those Gentlemen know what the etymological derivation of the word Parliament is? Parliament means a body that talks and discusses. It is not a mere voting machine.' Those who remember Mr Disraeli will recollect his attitude in this House as the most patient of listeners. He said to me—'I have never understood any subject really until I have heard it well debated in Parliament'—not by ten minutes speaking. We are asked, 'Why do not you conduct yourselves like business men? Why do not you behave as if you were a meeting of shareholders or a vestry meeting?' We do not, because we are not a meeting of shareholders, because we are not a vestry meeting, but because we are the great Parliament of England, and really these miserable conceptions of the way in which Parliament ought to conduct its business, make me almost despair of the House of Commons managing to appreciate the duties it has to perform. I remember Mr. Disraeli also saying—'I have very often learned more from a bore who understood the subject than from the most brilliant speaker in the House of Commons.'"

He (Sir F. Banbury), commended these words to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite and regretted that there was only one Cabinet Minister in his place on that the most momentous occasion that had occurred for the last fifteen years. So little did the Government regard the rights of the House in the discussion of a legitimate matter that, having brought down these guillotine Resolutions an hour ago, they had not the courtesy to stay and listen to what might be said against them. That was an insult to the House of Commons.

Minister had described as being of the utmost importance, being hurried through. He could only re-echo the words of the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London, when he said that the condition of the Front Government Bench was an insult to the House of Commons. Up to the present time any tampering with the Rules of the House had always been looked upon as a non-Party question. The Government, however, had now made it a Party affair. The proposed alterations created a revolution in the House, and ought not to be passed without full discussion being allowed. The Prime Minister's speech gave no adequate reason for the introduction of the Resolution under discussion. The right hon. Gentleman could not even get up and say that there had been obstructive speeches from the Opposition benches. It had been pointed out that when the late Government brought in their new rules, they allowed the House to discuss them day in and day out for some seventeen days, and what happened at the finish? The right hon. Gentleman would remember what happened at the finish, because if he remembered aright the right hon. Gentleman took considerable part in those debates and some of his speeches might be considered to be of an obstructive character. But at the end of seventeen days the late Government, because they found that, owing to the obstruction of hon. Gentlemen opposite, it was impossible to carry the proposed Rules, gave up the task in despair; they left them in the middle of a sentence, and that sentence had never been completed. On Thursday last they came down to the House perfectly prepared to consider the Rules at any length at which the Prime Minister wished to consider them. They were prepared to sit up with him all night and to have a free and fair discussion. The prospect of an all-night sitting, however, rather frightened the Prime Minister, and so he sent them all off to bed and brought forward this closure Resolution. Thus at the conclusion of four days the Rules were to be forced down their throats whether they liked them or not. And that was by a Government which came into office in favour of free speech and the rights of private Members. Well might the Chief Secretary for Ireland make the famous remark that minorities must suffer. That seemed to be the policy of the Government. The Opposition might be a very small minority, but they had not the slightest intention of taking this treatment lying down. The country would see that the Government were acting in a manner which was entirely without precedent. They were acting to get an advantage for themselves—to forward their own interests and not those of the House and the country. No adequate reason had been given by the Government for the suggested change. In fact, the real reason was that they were endeavouring to do too much. They gave so many pledges at the last general election that they found it difficult to fulfil them. What happened last session? The Government endeavoured to pass a great number of measures, but many of them had to be dropped, and those which were passed involved an autumn session, and Parliament sat for nine months. As to this session they had also given innumerable pledges. They had promised an Army Bill, a Licensing Bill, a Home Rule Bill, a Roman Catholic University Bill, a Land Bill for Scotland, and a Land Bill for England. How many of them did the Government intend to pass? New Rules of procedure were extremely difficult things to frame. The Opposition had been able to show that there were a great number of flaws in the proposed Rule, and it was only by ample discussion that flaws could be properly dealt with. He wished to add his protest to that of the Leader of the Opposition against the breach of faith of which the Government had been guilty in respect to the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Dublin University. The Government had promised to accept the principle of that Amendment, but when he picked up his Notice Paper, to his amazement he saw on it an Amendment entirely different from that which the Government said they intended to accept. It was not the first time the Government had committed a breach of faith with those who sat upon the Opposition Benches, and they felt that they had got to get accustomed to the practice. There were many important Amendments on the Paper, and it would be absolutely impossible to discuss them in the time allotted. He himself had an Amendment on the Paper in regard to the reporting of proceedings of the Grand Committees, but as it came last on the Paper he supposed it would be cut out by the closure. That Amendment proposed that an official report of the proceedings of, and speeches in, each Standing Committee should be taken and published in Hansard for the use of all Members of the House. The right hon. Gentleman promised that that matter should be thrashed out in a Committee of the House. It was an important Amendment, and he suggested that the only proper course for the Government to take up with regard to it under the present circumstances, having regard to the promise given to him by the Prime Minister, was that the Government should take that Amendment over and put it in their own name. He hoped the Government would reconsider this question, and give the House a little more time. The Government were treating the House in a very harsh manner in closing the debate at ten o'clock. Why could they not allow the House to sit up a few hours and discuss the new Rules amicably? If fair time were offered the Opposition were prepared to accept it. Nobody on the Opposition Benches had the faintest desire to obstruct the progress of the Rule. He appealed to the Government to give another day. The House would then be able to come to an amicable agreement with the Government, and they would be far more satisfied than it was possible to be under the present conditions.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) expressed astonishment that the Government had not supported by their own presence upon the Treasury Bench this remarkable Resolution. They had evidently made up their minds not to consider any extension of time which would have made their treatment of the House less oppressive. He had watched the changes of procedure of the House for many years, and he believed this was the first occasion upon which closure by compartments had been proposed by the Government of the day, merely in order to advance their own business, and not to put an end to obstruction and dilatory action on the part of the Opposition. The main grounds on which Amendments to the new Rule were moved were the summary manner in which it was proposed that Bills should go to a Grand Committee, and the unsatisfactory manner in which Motions were to be made that particular Bills should be retained in the House. He much regretted that it seemed to be becoming the practice for Members to make a speech and immediately leave the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe had made a speech in which he strongly supported the Motion made from the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman had left the House, but they might learn wisdom from his lips. In 1902 the right hon. Gentleman said he regretted that he had ever voted for the guillotine, and went on to say that so long as he remained in the House he would never vote for another such Motion. He further said he was an anti-closure man; that he believed the use of the closure marked the Parliamentary incapacity of those concerned in its use, and that users of it were not entitled to the same respect from the House as were the right hon. Gentlemen who piloted the Finance Bill and the Parish Councils Bill through the House without resort to the closure. The Government had fallen from the high ideals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe, who had given them the most effective support he could to the Motion, but had not thought fit to listen to the comments on it. The Prime Minister said he had moved the Motion with great reluctance, but he had not, like his predecessors in office, shown that the time occupied in discussing the new Rule had been so long and the discussion so fruitless that the Government had no alternative but to resort to the closure. The right hon. Gentleman did not say there had been any dilatory action on the part of the House; he only said they must "get on." Let them get on by all means, but let the House note that for the first time in the history of Parliament a Motion of this kind had been moved by the Government for the facilitation of their own business without any argument being placed before the House in support of their contention. On the last occasion when this new Rule was debated the Government admitted they were not able to answer the questions put to them. What was to be done with the Bills already remitted to Standing Committees? What was to be the attitude of the Government with regard to them? Had they thought of that and provided a remedy? Comparisons had been drawn between the Rules of debate introduced by the Leader of the Opposition and those now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, and reference had been made to the fact that seventeen days were taken to discuss those of his right hon. friend before the closure was applied. But so far as he was concerned that was not the question. It was enough to say there never was a change made of so far reaching a character as that proposed by this new Standing Order. It would be impossible to resist the action of the Government, but he did not think any moderate man on the Government side of the House would adopt the cry that the Opposition had attempted to obstruct the Government proposals. The change would not advance, but retard business; there would have to be still further alterations, and he firmly believed the country would say that the Government had no right to pass a Motion of this kind without giving the House time to consider it.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said he had listened with interest to his hon. friend the Member for Holderness, who had suggested that the course which ought to have been taken was that the House should have been asked to consider these proposals at a late sitting, probably an all-night sitting. In frankness and candour he wished to say that though he disapproved of the course taken by the Government, he could not himself think that an all-night sitting was a desirable alternative.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: I do not mind.

LORD R. CECIL said his hon. friend was good enough to say that he did not mind. But that was not the only question. He thought that that particular way of getting through their business, or pretending to get through it, was one that ought never, under any circumstances, to be adopted. But, none the less, he could not regard the present Resolution as a great improvement even on an all-night sitting. He was against all these "methods of barbarism" in dealing with the business of the House, methods which had one certain result—they destroyed the prestige of the House. If it was only the present House of Commons he would regard such an event with equanimity. He did not think that they were likely to do much which he would admire, and the less capable the present House was of important legislation the better he would be pleased. He had not that admiration for the principles of the present majority which would lead him to think that their legislation would be beneficial. He was sure that a Resolution of the kind now proposed materially diminished the power of the majority of the House to carry a great Resolution on such a question as the House of Lords. If they were going to attack the House of Lords, they might be perfectly certain that they would not be successful without mature and proper consideration; and if it was to be said that the House was being muzzled, and that their ancient privileges had been curtailed, the country would pay very little attention to the verdicts at which they arrived on that and other questions. There was another great objection to a Resolution of this kind. The legislative functions of the House had already been to a great extent transferred to the Government of the day. He believed that right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House thought that it should be the Government of the day who shaped the legislative action of the House. They put it in that courteous way; but what it meant was that the Government were to decide on the legislation and the House were to sanction that decision. That, he feared, was past praying for. But there was left to them the deliberative power of the House, no less important than the legislative power. Resolutions of this kind, however, shattered and destroyed that deliberative power, and when both the deliberative and the legislative powers of the House had been destroyed, he very much feared that there would not be attracted the most desirable persons to fulfil the high and important duties attaching to Membership of the House. For his part, therefore, he very much regretted this new departure. It would be exceedingly unfortunate if, owing to the operation of this Resolution, the proposal in regard to the Scottish Committee received no discussion at all. It appeared to him that that deserved the full discussion of the House. On Resolutions affecting the procedure of the House there was only one opportunity of discussion,. It would be conceded by everyone that the proposal as to the Scottish Committee was of enormous importance. At the present moment, when a Bill affecting Scotland was sent to a Standing Committee, the Committee of Selection put upon the Committee fifteen experts, who would naturally be Scottish Members, who would know something about the subject, and, the Committee would have full advantage of their knowledge on the matter. But the purpose of this Resolution was to prevent any but Scottish Members taking part in the discussion at all. It was an exclusive and not an inclusive Resolution. That amounted to an assertion that nobody but Scottish Members were capable of discussing Scottish affairs. That was a principle of very far-reaching importance—how far, could be seen by the claims from various sections of the House to have the same principle applied to them. There was the Welsh claim, which, since it was backed by a large Liberal representation, the Prime Minister had immediately conceded. There was the London claim. Unfortunately for the hon. Member who was responsible for it, London had, in exceeding bad taste, returned a considerable number of Conservatives and Unionists, and therefore the Prime Minister promptly ignored the claim.

Sir EDWIN CORNWALL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): The claim has not been ignored.

Lord R. CECIL said the claim had been absolutely ignored so far as the Prime Minister was concerned, unless the hon. Gentleman had some secret understanding with the right hon. Gentleman. Then there was the case—he must apologise for mentioning it—of England. He was quite aware that under the present administration it seemed to be regarded as axiomatic that Scotland and Wales were entitled to special treatment, but no special privilege of any kind was to be given to England. That, it appeared to him, was one of the questions which might well be a matter for discussion; it was a matter of importance, and one in which the country took some interest. He regretted very much that under this Motion such discussion would be practically precluded. There were about three pages of Amendments on the Paper and a fourth page with regard to the Scottish Committee, and as there would not be more than five or six hours for the Amendments preceding those referring to the Scottish Committee, it was incredible that they would reach discussion on the latter question at all. The question of the Scottish Committee had been presented to the House by the Prime Minister in a most perfunctory manner, and was to be voted upon absolutely sub silentio. Therefore, he earnestly pressed the House to support the Amendment of which he had given notice and which he now moved, to the effect that the proposal as to the Scottish Committee should be omitted from the Resolution. He appealed to hon. Members not to assent to the Resolution without some such limitation in order that this important change in their Constitution should not be made without, at any rate, fair discussion.

*Mr. SMEATON (Stirlingshire), in seconding the Amendment, asked the Government to give it their consideration, for the reason that in regard to the constitution of the proposed Scottish Grand Committee there was a good deal of difference of opinion among hon. Members and also in the Scottish constituencies themselves. The Government had only to look at the Amendments on the Paper by Scottish Members in order to convince themselves of this. Time should be given for full and fair discussion of the matter; but under the present Resolution there would be no discussion at all, and the whole thing would be "guillotined." Many thought, that the question of the constitution of the Scottish Committee required a good deal of sifting and it would be a pity if discussion were stifled. He thought that the Government would do well to give consideration to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 2, after the word 'Procedure,' to insert the words 'other than so much of such Motions as refers to the establishment of a Scottish Committee.'"—(Lord R. Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) regretted exceedingly that the Government had found it necessary to introduce the guillotine at all. He thought that the Prime Minister was not particularly in love with it himself, and had only introduced it with the intention of expediting business. He did not say where the blame lay, but he could not but regret that they had not more of what there used to be, namely, "deals" with regard to public business. He did not know whether any suggestion had been made on one side or the other, or whether there was a spirit on the other side not to accept any arrangement which would have made this Resolution unnecessary, but there seemed to be an absence of that disposition to come to arrangements which he had seen session after session during the fifteen years he had been in Parliament. He regretted that, in the first place, because it introduced a temper into their debates which was greatly to be deprecated, and nobody suffered from it more than the Government of the day. He was a strong disciple of the Prime Minister when he stood up for the policy of "splitting the difference." He always thought it a good policy for getting business through. He was sorry they were occupying time in discussing this Motion which might have been usefully given to the discussion of the Procedure Rule. Somebody had said the Rules were a Party matter. Certainly they ought not to be. He was afraid he was rather conservative on many matters, and this was one of them. They were setting up, for good or for evil, a form of procedure which would be permanent, unless some future Government interfered with it; and it was of vital importance, therefore, if these Committees upstairs were to have that importance which in his opinion they demanded, that the House as a whole should be parties to the arrangement. They knew what the result would be when the Bills came back from those Committees. He regretted that the Government had regarded the course they had taken as necessary. He did not blame the Government, because they were responsible for the business of the House, but he would have much preferred it if the question had been made a matter of general understanding between both sides of the House, for then the time of the House would have been much better occupied. He could not agree with what the hon. Member for Aberdeen had said in regard to what he called the undoubted obstruction which had taken place. The Prime Minister did not make that the basis of his Motion, his ground being that they must get on with public business. He did not think that, in the ordinarily accepted sense of deliberate obstruction, there had been any undue abuse of the rules of debate on this very important question. The immediate question was whether the Motion should apply to the Scottish Grand Committee, or whether that point should be left to be considered on some future day. If they accepted the noble Lord's Motion it would probably delay the consideration of the subject until the end of the session, with no guarantee that they would have an opportunity of considering it at all. He would remind the House that they had before had a Scottish Grand Committee which represented the whole House, and there was no vital difference between that Committee and the one now suggested. He regretted that it had not been found possible to settle the question without the aid of the guillotine, but as he was in favour of setting up a Scottish Grand Committee he should vote against the Amendment.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said the hon. Member who had just sat down had stated that the Government had made no attempt to come to an arrangement with the Opposition in regard to bringing the debate on this Rule to a close.

Mr. DALZIEL said he had not made any such assertion. What he said was that he did not know whether any such attempt had been made.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said there was a way of saying one "wondered" whether any attempt had been made which implied that no attempt had been made. If his hon. friend had been in the House when he introduced this Motion, he would have heard him say that an attempt was made to come to an arrangement with the Opposition in regard to the new scheme of procedure; and it was because they were told that the arrangement would not be accepted, that no other arrangement would be listened to, and that the Opposition had determined to fight the thing to the bitter end, that the Government had resolved to take another course. He agreed with the noble Lord as to the importance and the expediency of having an opportunity of discussing the appointing of a Scottish Grand Committee, but why could they not discuss it? Simply because so much time had been thrown away by the Opposition moving unimportant Amendments, by unnecessary repetition, and by other means of occupying time. [OPPOSITION cries of "No, no."] Now they were asked to exclude the question of the Scottish Committee from this proposal, and to reserve it until a more convenient season. They wished to get that Grand Committee started because business of great importance was waiting to be referred to it. The time at the disposal of the Government was already mortgaged for other business of great importance, for the carrying through of which the setting up of this Scottish Committee was required. Therefore it was quite impossible to accept the Amendment. Without any desire to diminish the authority of the noble Lord in this matter, perhaps he might be allowed to say that he had not been very long in the House, and he had certainly not been a Member long enough to have had much experience of those questions which had been before the Scottish Committee. There was a Scottish Commiteee in 1894 which worked exceedingly well, and passed most useful legislation. It proved an immense success and passed one or two most important measures which had proved a blessing to Scotland ever since, and it was because it was not continued that there had been practically no Scottish legislation since. It would be seen that it was upon past experience they were proceeding, and that diminished the necessity that might otherwise have existed for a full and elaborate discussion of the principle of a Scottish Grand Committee. The Government could not make any exception to their Motion. Those who wished to criticise the new Procedure Rule should have confined their Amendments to points of importance; if that had been done there would have been abundance of time for the discussion of the proposal of a Scottish Grand Committee. But that course had not been taken, and the Government, therefore, were compelled to make this Motion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said the Prime Minister had suggested that, because they had a different kind of Scottish Committee established under a Sessional Order thirteen years ago, therefore it was unimportant and of no consequence that they should discuss a proposal to constitute a new form of Scottish Committee this year. That was a declaration which had aroused considerable difference of opinion not merely among the Members of the House, but among people outside. The right hon. Gentleman was so anxious for Scotland's welfare, and so tender of her interests, that he could not find even a single day to discuss an important question on which Scottish opinion was, as the hon. Member had said, so widely divided. [Cries of "No."] Of course, when doctors differed, they must settle the matter among themselves. He had correctly represented what was said by the hon. Member for Stirlingshire, and was that not enough to prove his case? It was not only the interests of Scotland that were concerned. The right hon. Gentleman was forced by the precedent which he was in the course of creating to support another sectional or Grand Committee which, by the necessity of the case, must be differently composed from that for Scotland. Was the House to have any opportunity of discussing that? The right hon. Gentleman was in favour of referring all Scottish measures to a Committee in which the Scottish Members would form a majority, and in a Committee of eighty they would form a considerable majority. But Wales, having very many fewer Members, would stand in a wholly different position in the Welsh Grand Committee from that which Scotland would occupy in the Scottish Grand Committee. These were matters which were worthy of consideration. The House ought to know how the Government justified their proposals, but they were to have no opportunity of discussing them. The Prime Minister said he was anxious that the Scottish Grand Committee should get to work at once. On what? No Scottish Bill had passed the Second Reading. There was no reason for this hurry. There had, indeed, been a Land Tenure Bill for Scotland introduced, but was not that one of the measures which by the declaration of the Prime Minister it was not the intention of the Government to refer to a Committee upstairs?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Why not?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that was a grave announcement and showed the necessity for full debate. The House had been repeatedly told that it was not intended to send the principal or highly contentious Government measures to these Committees. Was the Land Tenure Bill a principal measure, or was it merely a by-product? It was certainly supposed that such a Bill would fall within the category of those the Government would exempt by motion. If it was intended to send such a Bill upstairs, the proposal became ten times more important. It would be a monstrous infringement of the rights and privileges of Parliament that such a proposition should be put through without discussion on the fiat of the Government. The Government had had the opportunity of carrying out a reform of procedure with the hearty approval of the Opposition; but, having chosen a set of Rules which they must have known to be highly contentious, they had only themselves to thank for the discussion that had arisen. If the discussion of the new rules had taken three, four, or five days more, it would have been a very moderate allowance of time compared with the time spent on the same subject when the Conservative Government was in office At any rate, the particular point to which the present Amendment was directed, namely, the exclusion from the guillotine resolution of the proposal to set up sectional Grand Committees, taking Members from one part of the House instead of from the House as a whole, was one which should be accepted by the Government. If the proposal of the Government were passed without discussion, it would be a scandal.
he hoped even this House of Commons would not sanction.

SIR EDWIN CORNWALL said the Government were perfectly justified in proposing the guillotine with respect to the Amendments dealing with the classes of Bills to be exempted from the operation of the Rule. He understood from the Prime Minister on another occasion that it was on that series of Amendments the House had taken up sufficient time. He understood the right hon. Gentleman had brought forward the guillotine Resolution to release the House from that difficulty, but the Motion had been moved in a form which would penalise not only the Members who had put down that series of Amendments, but also other Members of the House, supporters of the Government, who wished to have an opportunity of discussing what kind of Grand Committees ought to be set up. He was not speaking with the object of embarrassing the Government in any way. This was not a Party question. He was entirely opposed to hon. Gentlemen opposite taking up so much time on the question whether certain Bills should go to the Grand Committees. That part of the proposal ought to be guillotined, but a fair opportunity should be given for discussing what kind of Standing Committees should be set up. He had taken the trouble to ascertain the number of public Acts passed by this House during the last thirty years. He found that there had been 1,285 passed affecting the United Kingdom as a whole; 132 affecting England and Wales; 204 affecting Scotland; 248 affecting Ireland; seventy-four affecting London; and five affecting Wales. Did not these figures prove that the House before deciding what kind of Standing Committees were to be set up should have full opportunity of discussing the kind of business to be done, having regard to past experience? Great injustice would be done to certain sections of the House if that course was not followed. In the past when Scottish Bills were considered in Committee of the Whole House, and the Scottish Members remained in the House, it was practically a Scottish Committee. If there was a London Bill before the House they could rely that the London Members would remain in the Chamber. Private Bills would not be affected by his proposal: but if General Public Bills applying only to London were sent upstairs to a Committee of eighty Members many London Members would lose the opportunity which they had at present of making a contribution to debate. He had spoken to private Members and even to members of the Government on the matter, and they seemed to think that in making his proposal for a Special Grand Committee for London he was not fully justified, because they asked, "What about Lancashire and Yorkshire?" [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed as if he were making a geographical comparison. His comparison was as to the amount of business which the House was called upon to do in regard to the London area. He appealed to the Prime Minister to give his support to the change which he proposed. During the last thirty years Wales had had only five Public Acts applying separately to the Principality; whereas London in the same period had had seventy-four Bills before the House. The proposal was not a fair recognition of the claims of London—more especially when the principles of the Bills applicable to London and the urgency of the problems with which they dealt were considered. He thought that the guillotine Motion should apply to the earlier part of the Government proposals, so that a discussion might be allowed with regard to setting up a Grand Committee for London. If the Bills for the different Grand Committees were not ready at the beginning of the session the arrangements could be altered so that the best use of hon. Members could be made to deal with Irish, Scottish, Welsh, and London Bills.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington) understood that a few Ministers, including the Prime Minister himself, had complained that he had declined to come to any arrangement with regard to the discussion on the Rules of Procedure. What happened? On Thursday last the Prime Minister proposed to take certain Navy Votes on the following Monday, on Tuesday the Second Reading of the Army Bill was to be taken, and on Wednesday certain minor measures like the Patents Bill. When pressed on that question the right hon. Gentleman said that if the Rules of Procedure debate was not concluded on Thursday night—a proposition which never for a moment appeared to be possible to hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House—he would continue the debate on Monday. About eleven o'clock the Patronage Secretary spoke to him behind the Chair and asked him if there was any chance of coming to an arrangement, and he told the Patronage Secretary that the only arrangement he could come to was in regard to the Army Bill, and that the Opposition were ready to give the Second Reading of that Bill if a full day were given to its discussion. He could not understand what the Government wanted in regard to the Rules. At that moment the Eleven o'clock Rule was suspended, and he said to the Patronage Secretary that the debate might go on to two, three, four o'clock in the morning, or after, and under those circumstances it was impossible for him to come to an arrangement. Immediately after that, the Prime Minister, instead of taking advantage of the facilities the House had given him of continuing the debate, announced that he would move a guillotine Resolution. It was not likely he would make a bargain after that. There was another thing which the Government had overlooked. At the moment it was attempted to make a bargain on Thursday there stood on the Paper Amendments to the Rules of Procedure in the names of no less than thirty-two of the supporters of the Government, and he was acting not only as trustee for his own side of the House, but in the interests of the House generally. He might tell the right hon. Gentleman and his friends that, until he got orders to the contrary from his leader, he would not make any bargain of a kind which surrendered the liberties of the House, so long as he held the position he now occupied.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland) said he quite agreed that the House should have an opportunity of discussing the proposals of the Government. The time taken up in discussing Scottish Bills was generally consumed by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House. If Bills were sent to the Grand Committee, Scottish Members would have an opportunity of discussing them which they did not have in Committee of the Whole House. He understood that the Amendment now under discussion was to cut Scotland out of the Grand Committee proposal altogether. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] Well, that was how he read it. The main reason for bringing forward the proposal was that they might have an opportunity for discussing Scottish business, otherwise they could not get any Scottish business done at all. For anyone to suggest that there was much or any difference of opinion in Scotland on this matter was absurd. In fact what the Scottish people were asking for was something more than a Grand Committee; they were asking for Home Rule, but they were willing to take a Grand Committee as an instalment. There was another reason. Scotland generally was in advance of the rest of the United Kingdom; and Scotland was willing to show by passing legislation for her own people a good example to the rest of the United Kingdom, although he did not know that the rest of the United Kingdom would follow that example very rapidly They had been told by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer that England would inevitably get the reforms that Scotland got.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN was understood to say that he never said that.

MR. MORTON said he took it down at the time. If that were true, why had England not Sunday closing which was passed for Scotland sixty years ago, or a complete system of national education such as they had had in Scotland for hundreds of years? But was that any reason for Scotland not getting the reforms that were absolutely necessary for the welfare of her people and of the whole of Great Britain? He believed that even now they could discuss the question and come to as intelligent a decision as they could if they were to debate it for weeks. He did not blame the Tory Party for their action in the matter, because they were merely acting according to their nature, and did not want the House to pass legislation. England wanted a good many reforms and so did Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, but the Tory Party said they should not have them. Last year a Bill which affected not only England and Wales, but Scotland, was sent up to the Grand Committee, passed that Committee, and came down to this House and was passed into law.

*MR. SPEAKER said the hon. Gentleman was straying from the question before the House, which was the method of dealing with the Procedure Resolutions. He must confine himself to the question before the House; what he was saying had nothing to do with the Rules.

MR. MORTON said he only wanted to point out that if what was mainly an English Land Bill could go before a Grand Committee and be dealt with, surely a Scottish Land Bill could also go there. He hoped that the Prime Minister with his immense majority would insist upon doing some business, in spite of the fact that it was the desire of the Tory Party not to do business. Ministerialists, however, wished to do business, and above all, what the Members for Scotland wanted was the establishment of this Scottish Committee. They were told last session that Scotland must wait, but he thought that they had a right to insist upon the Rules being altered, so that the House of Commons might be in a position to do business and to carry out the many important reforms which were desired by the Scottish people for the welfare of the whole of the population. He trusted, therefore, that the Amendment would not be supported by any Liberal Members on any account whatever, because the main reason they wanted this alteration of the Rules of Procedure was to obtain this Scottish Committee, so that matters affecting Scotland might be referred to Scottish Members and to Scottish Members only.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he must congratulate the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, on having exercised in favour of the facilitation of business those gifts of concise exposition of which they had had such long and pleasurable experience. He himself rose, not to continue the debate initiated by the right hon. Gentleman, but to make an appeal to the Government. Of course it would not be worth making if it absolutely traversed their policy, but he proposed to ask them to do something to remove what he thought they must feel to be the greatest blot upon their proposal. He objected to bringing any debate on the Rules of the House to a violent close, until the necessity had been more amply proved than it had been on the present occasion; but he waived that point now, and asked the Government whether they could not do something to avoid the scandal of making part of the permanent machinery of Parliament a Scottish Committee which had never been made a part of their permanent machinery, and of instituting for the first time a Welsh Committee, of which nobody had ever yet heard, and refusing, if those principles were accepted, even to discuss the possibility of an extension to other parts of the country which might have as great a right to such Committees as Wales or Scotland, or a greater right than they had. Would it be impossible for the Government, if they thought a clear and precise limit must be put to this discussion, to exclude from the Rule as printed the subject of the Scottish and Welsh Grand Committees, and the Amendments to the proposal for Grand Committees, and, having accepted that Amendment, to add a rider stating that two full Parliamentary days would be given to the discussion of the Amendments to Standing Order 47? If hon. Members would look at their Papers they would see that all these proposals and Amendments came up under Standing Order 47, and he would suggest that two days should be given to their discussion, and when those days had concluded there should be the same form of guillotine as was now proposed. The House would then be relieved of the fear of an unlimited series of Amendments postponing to an indefinite future the conclusion of the discussion on the Government's proposals. They would know exactly the amount of time which could not be exceeded in the discussion of these Rules, and they would have avoided the grave inconvenience and scandal, and the unprecedented blot on their debates, of having carried out a revolutionary change in Parliamentary procedure with such an absence of discussion and divisions as was now contemplated. He made this suggestion in a spirit of conciliation.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.), whilst appreciating the spirit which animated the right hon. Gentleman, said it was impossible for the Government to assent to the proposal that two days should be given to the discussion of these Rules. It was impossible to minimise the importance of the Scottish or Welsh Grand Committee question, but a considerable amount of time would be available that evening. [Cries of "Private Bill."] The private Bill was, he understood, unopposed. The Government would be ready to give facilities with a view to placing the time on the following day under the control of the Opposition, practically from four until ten o'clock, for bringing forward the Amendments to which they attached the greatest importance. That was, he thought, a very fair response to the right hon. Gentleman.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) moved an Amendment to exempt from the operation of the Rule the proposal with regard to a Welsh Committee, and also the application of Standing Orders 26 and 27 giving power of closure, to Grand Committees. So far as the first part of this Amendment was concerned it did not come under the ban of the Prime Minister, who had desired the House to concentrate their attention on and to discuss the most important of the Amendments. Had the debate on the Rule concluded on the previous Thursday they could not possibly have concentrated their attention on the Amendment just placed upon the Paper. There was a strong case for the exclusion of the Welsh Committee because there had been no opportunity of ascertaining the Government's position on the point. Wales was not in the same position as Scotland, and therefore the question that arose was entirely different. Wales was to be attached to one of the Standing Committees, and the Motion of the Prime Minister proposed to alter Standing Order 48. Hitherto it had been possible for the Committee of Selection to alter the general body of Members who sat on Grand Committees, but the Prime Minister now proposed to make the members of those bodies irremovable. To those bodies were to be added fifteen under the Standing Order to which the Welsh proposition was attached. And now having got a Standing Committee the Members of which were irremovable and to which fifteen Members were to be added, it was proposed to add thirty-two more, all of one complexion of politics, a policy which was directly opposed to all the principles of their Constitution. An entirely new principle was to be adopted. That was a condition of things that required and deserved some discussion in the House, but which under this guillotine proposal would be voted on without any debate whatever, and without a single word of explanation from the Government as to how the scheme intended to work. Another matter which ought not to be passed sub silentio was the proposal of the Government under which the whole of the powers of closure were to be given to the Standing Committees. Anybody who looked back to the time when the closure was introduced into that House knew what interest it excited, but it might not be within the recollection of the House that in the last Parliament the Deputy Chairman of Committees, a salaried official of the House, had not the right to accept the closure except on a declaration made to the House that the Chairman was unavoidably absent. They were now proposing to give those powers to Chairmen sitting upstairs. They were giving these Committees power to cut short debates at the very moment they were professing a desire to give greater freedom of discussion. He did not think that this was a proposal which the House should sanction. He urged that before the Standing Order was passed the House should have some opportunity of discussion. It was undesirable that the Standing Order now proposed should be adopted. They had always had Standing Orders which were applicable to the condition of things in the House whichever Party was in power. Let them take the proposal for a Welsh Committee, and suppose the Constitutional Party were returned to power. How would it be possible for the Welsh Committee any more than the Scottish Committee to exist if entirely composed of Welsh Liberal Members? The Members for Wales were generally of the opposite way of thinking to the Unionist Party, and it would be impossible for a Unionist Government to entrust legislation to Grand Committees of that nature, because no Government would consent to send legislation to Committees on which they were in a minority. Therefore, they were proposing Standing Orders which must be altered whenever there was a change in the balance of opinion in the House. If, as was suggested, these were made only Sessional Orders, of course the matter could be rectified; but as long as the Government insisted on their being Standing Orders, he earnestly urged that they should at least give an opportunity for discussion of the two very important matters dealt with in his Amendment. He begged to move.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor), in seconding the Amendment, said that in regard to the question of a Committee for Wales the attitude of the Government had indeed been remarkable. Nobody knew that this Welsh Standing Committee was going to be set up at all, but at the last moment the Prime Minister apparently had yielded to the threats of the hon. Member for Swansea and other Welsh Members, and they were now obliged to agree to an Amendment of the Standing Order which would revolutionise the system of procedure as regarded Welsh Bills, without there being the slightest opportunity of full and fair discussion. It was most essential that this Welsh proposal should be exempted from the Resolution. It was unfair to the House that they should be left in that position, and that a proposal which because it was unfair could not be permanent should be passed by means of the closure. If the Government brought in another Welsh Disestablishment Bill, would it be relegated to this small, and, without offence, he would say packed Committee upstairs, and then when it came down to the House on the Report stage be dealt with under conditions which would allow hon. Members to make only one speech? He did not know what the Prime Minister proposed to do in that respect, but they had all believed and hoped that he would assent to a provision for plurality of speeches on the Report stage. That, apparently, was not to be. It made it all the more unfair that this proposal with regard to the Welsh Committee should not be discussed. As regarded the other portion of the Amendment, there were equally strong grounds for excepting it from the guillotine Motion. Formerly, they used to be extremely chary about applying the closure at all, and if its application had been more strongly opposed by one Party than another, he would have thought it was by the Party now in office; yet that Party deliberately proposed not merely that the guillotine should be used in the House, but that it should also be used in Grand Committees upstairs. Much of the valuable work of amending Bills was done in Grand Committee, but if the proceedings were to be subject to closure the value of the work would be very much diminished. On the other hand, if the Bill was to be carefully examined and fully amended in all its details, and in all respects properly considered, they must not merely send it up to the Grand Committee, which had proved so valuable in the past, but they must not fetter the discussions in that Committee. He appealed most strongly to the Government and the House to let this matter be thrashed out thoroughly before they altered the Standing Orders, and to except from the Resolution that part which related to the closure.

"In line 2, after the word 'Procedure,' to insert the words 'other than so much of such Motions as refer to the establishment of a Welsh and Monmouthshire Committee and which apply the Standing Orders 26 and 27 (Closure) to the Standing Committees.'"—(Mr. Laurence Hardy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said the Rules of Procedure introduced by the Leader of the Opposition in 1902 raised no such questions as were involved in the proposals of the Prime Minister. He had only to direct attention to the Amendments to be moved by his right hon. friend the Member for the Hallam division of Sheffield. For instance, Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom, Bills to ratify treaties, Conventions, or other international instruments——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not addressing himself to the Amendment which refers to a Committee for Wales and Monmouthshire.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said his object was to show that matters of great magnitude were involved, and that the question which had been raised by his hon. friend behind him was of even still greater magnitude than those subjects to which he had referred. In that House, so far as the Government were concerned, there were two Parties—one the Labour Members below the Gangway, and the other the President of the Board of Trade. They were both very powerful. The Labour Members had been able to secure certain concessions, and the President of the Board of Trade had been able to secure for Wales a special Standing Committee. If the Labour Members, or Saul, had slain his thousands, David had slain his tens of thousands. Behind the proposals of the Prime Minister was a process of devolution. He believed that the scheme for a Scottish Grand Committee and a Welsh Grand Committee was a species of devolution intended to lead up to the larger policy of which the right hon. Gentleman was the most distinguished exponent. Presently they would have from the Nationalist Benches a proposal to establish an Irish Standing Committee. [Cries of "Why not."] He had never known Irish Members in that House to miss an opportunity to secure some sort of concession, valuable or less valuable. If they once established the principle of Standing Committees for each portion of the United Kingdom they would be striking a blow at the very union of discussion which when the Union was created it was intended to have. The whole tendency was antipathetic and that was an extremely bad thing. The proposal to establish a Welsh Standing Committee, small as it might seem, taken in conjunction with the Scottish Standing Committee was a blow at general discussion in the House. The proposals put forward by the Government were such as to entitle them to a much longer time for discussion than would be given if this Motion were carried. The question fundamentally affected the rights and obligations of hon. Members. If every Welsh and Scottish question was to be sent upstairs, an evil which they had always deplored would be intensified. Upon one occasion, when he ventured to discuss the principle of local option, he was looked upon with perfect astonishment because Scotland only was concerned. The principle involved, however, was one which affected the whole country. If it was considered indiscreet for an hon. Member representing an English constituency to intervene in a Scottish debate, how much worse would it be when these particular questions were sent to Scottish, Welsh or Irish Committees for discussion. By opposing these proposals the Opposition were performing a duty which he was sure would be recognised some day by hon. Members opposite.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.) said the hon. Member who moved the Amendment argued that the Welsh proposal was of such first-rate importance that the House should have the fullest opportunity of discussing it. What was the proposal? It was to include the thirty-four Welsh Members in one of the Committees which had to deal with a Bill which was exclusively Welsh. The Committee of Selection now added fifteen Members to an ordinary Committee. These fifteen Members in the case of a Welsh Bill would form part of the thirty-four Welsh Members. In ordinary circumstances there were five or six Welsh Members on one of the Standing Committees. There remained, therefore, thirteen or fourteen more Welsh Members who would be put on the Committee, possibly in exchange for others. The result was that out of a Committee of eighty Members there would be thirty-four Welsh Members to deal with a Bill which was exclusively Welsh. That matter was considered by hon. Gentlemen opposite of such importance that it should be excluded from the operation of this Resolution. The second point raised was that the proposal to give the Chairmen of these Committees power to grant the closure was so important that it ought to have a special opportunity for full discussion. It was obvious that the powers of the Chairmen at present were inadequate and unsatisfactory, and he would have thought it was the general desire of the House that such a power should be granted. He did not think the proposal of the Government was of such a novel and revolutionary kind as to justify these Amendments.

MR. WALTER LONG said the right hon. Gentleman had not realised the real strength of the opposition to his proposals. It was not a mere matter of adding so many members to the Committee. The real question was whether the new Grand Committee was to reflect the opinion and composition of the existing House of Commons, or whether it was to be composed of the Members for that particular part of the country with merely those added to bring it up to the necessary number. The representation of Wales was for the most part in the hands of one Party. Did the Government seriously propose that, in order that the Grand Committee should represent the House, they should add to it a sufficient number of English and Scottish Members to flood the Welshmen and prevent their representing the Principality and giving to the Committee the political complexion that their representation justified? The Government were proposing to overshadow them by the representatives of other parts of the country. The right hon. Gentleman said it was a small proposal, but the Member for Gravesend had shown beyond answer that it was unquestionably the beginning of a very much larger proposal. It might be that that was the object which the Government had in view. The reason of the closuring by compartments proposal was not factious opposition on that side of the House. The only justification for it was that the Government had got their business into such a condition that they had to pass matters through the House practically without discussion. He thought the principle involved was an extremely bad one, and that it destroyed the whole character of the House. He did not suppose there had been one Amendment moved which had not been genuine and conceived with the desire to make the proposals of the Government more workable. He protested against the arbitrary and tyrannical action of the Government in preventing the discussion of questions which seriously affected the business of the House.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said he did not think the House realised the very great importance of the duties to be entrusted to the Chairmen of the Standing Committees, under the proposed regulations. He should be sorry to say one word in disparagement of the gentlemen who had filled the Chair in the Standing Committees, and he hoped he should not be acting in a manner showing want of appreciation of their work if he pointed out the great difference in the method of their appointment from that of the Chairman of Ways and Means. If it were proposed to appoint as the Chairman of the Committees of this House a gentleman who was not acceptable, they knew how such a Motion would be dealt with. But the appointment of the Chairman of a Standing Committee was not the act of the Whole House; it was the act of the Committee of Selection, and he could not help thinking that if it came to a case of strain, there might be great difficulty arising out of the fact that the Chairman of a Standing Committee was appointed by the Committee of Selection only. There was this further difficulty. Those who occupied the position of Speaker, or Chairman of Committees, soon gained valuable experience and became more and more influential, but the Chairman of a Standing Committee only occupied his position for a short time. He came and went, and his position was not the same as that of the gentlemen who presided over the House itself. Another objection to the proposed new Rules was the want of publicity in the Standing Committees. When the closure was given in the House it was given before the world. It was given before those who, whether in or out of the House, criticised their proceedings. But the closure when applied by the Chairmen of these Committees would be deprived of the benefit of publicity which was so great a guarantee for safety and impartiality. He was perfectly sure that as time went on the importance of these arguments would be appreciated. In regard to Wales, he was not sure that a Bill for the Disestablisment and Disendowment of the Church in Wales was exclusively Welsh business, because the Welsh dioceses were not coincident with any of the English counties. Where a Welsh Disestablisment Bill was discussed years ago that was the great difficulty. If it was a great difficulty then, it would become an impossibility now under the proposed Standing Order, because a Motion with reference to the Welsh Church would not be exclusively Welsh business. He looked with the greatest apprehension on this principle of what he would venture to term disintegration. What he desired to see continued was the United Kingdom—united in sympathy, in policy, and in future prospects. He looked with the greatest dread on these proposals, however innocent they might seem at first sight—proposals which would involve separation in their administrative and legislative business of one part of the country after another, instead of securing a united whole. He deprecated in the strongest manner the idea of disintegration and separation, regarding it as not respectful to the House.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

Question put.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. EVELYN CECIL said he desired to move, in line 2, after the word "shall" to insert the words "be taken on Tuesday," and the consequential Amendment, in line 4, to leave out "Tuesday, the 16th day of April," in order to insert, "Wednesday, the 17th day of April." His object was to give effect to the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition that an additional day should be given for the discussion of the more important features of the Closure Resolution. He did not think that many words ought to be needed to commend this course to the House, because sufficient latitude of time ought to be given to hon. Members to enable them adequately to discuss the many important questions which were raised by the new Rules. Not the least important of these was whether hon. Members were to be allowed to speak more than once on the Report stage of Bills which came down from Grand Committees. Unless that privilege were allowed, he believed that it would lead to the prolongation instead of the shortening of debate.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, and there being Private Business set down by the Chairman of Ways and Means under Standing Order No. 8, further Proceeding was postponed without Question put.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL (BY ORDER.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.), in moving the rejection of the Bill, said that as one who had been Deputy-Chairman of the London County Council he deeply regretted to oppose it. He naturally felt regret because of the changed character of the London County Council, and its new political complexion. It might be asked what his reasons were for opposing the Bill. He noticed a statement in The Times a few days ago stating that Mr. Boland had been notified by the London County Council of their intention to withdraw from the Bill the clause to which Roman Catholic Members took exception, empowering the police to visit Roman Catholic institutions where lodgings were provided for the poor and destitute, and that the Nationalists would not persist in their opposition when the measure came before the House of Commons for Second Reading. Such an announcement was full of interest at the present time. It threw a good deal of light upon the claims the Roman Catholic Church were now making upon the London County Council. It recalled Lord Beaconsfield's famous saying—

> "I know your Church—you plead for tolerance, but you ask for supremacy."

The clause to which reference was made was Clause 85 which ran as follows—

> "No premises within the county shall be deemed to be exempt from the provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851 and 1853, as amended by the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1902, or part 9 referring to the Common Lodging Houses of the last-mentioned Act or by any Act amending the said Act in which persons are harboured or lodged not for hire for a period not exceeding a week at a time."

He did not wish to say one word against the good work that was done by members of the Roman Catholic Church among the poor outcasts of London. There were many good and earnest men engaged in such work, but he could not help asking why this secrecy was wanted on the part of the Roman Catholics. If there was nothing to conceal, why endeavour to conceal it? The Bill dealt with a very large number of issues, and he thought the House was entitled to a full declaration and explanation in order to make clear what these mysterious arrangements between the County Council and the Roman Catholics really meant. He had worked hard for many years for the party who now governed the County Council, and no one rejoiced more than he at the victory of the Moderate Party, but he could imagine no means better calculated to make the people out of touch with the London County Council than any surrender such as this to a Church, which claimed to dictate to the London County Council, and more often to the people of England as a whole. Where it was based on a claim for tolerance and equality of treatment, they were prepared to grant it, but he thought it was an episode in the history of the County Council that required explanation. He moved that the Bill be read that day six months.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) seconded the Motion, but said he opposed the Bill on broader grounds than the hon. Member for West Down because it seemed to him on looking through the Bill that if it had been necessary to have Clause 85 inserted, there should be some reasonable explanation of why it was being dropped. He could not see why the words referring to the various statutes dealing with common lodging-houses should not be retained in Section 85 as originally set out in the Bill. He agreed that nearly all the safeguards laid down were safeguards which ought to be made applicable to the Bill before the House. If hon. Members would look at the sections of the old Act as regarded common lodging-houses and the precautions to be taken he thought that not one of them would say that any hardship would be inflicted if this provision were retained. Therefore some explanation should be forthcoming as to why the most valuable terms of the old Act were not to be made applicable to this Bill. It was a matter of the greatest importance, and ought to be cleared up. At present it looked as if there was something more than appeared on the surface.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. L. T. Corbett.)

*MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) thought that on this occasion his hon. friend the Member for North Down had tumbled upon a nidus equinus or mare's nest, and he could assure him that his suspicion that those who were responsible for the omission of this clause showed any trace of sectarianism was without any foundation whatever. They had left out this clause because there was a very widespread and general opposition to it, not from one Roman Catholic society, but from a large number of Church of England societies. He thought he was right in saying that six societies petitioned against the clause, and only one was Roman Catholic, the rest being Church of England bodies. Those responsible for the Church of England Homes for Waifs and Strays protested against Clause 85. They did not object to the homes being inspected by the Local Government Board or the Home Office, but it was submitted that they should not be inspected by the County Council except for purposes of sanitation and the provision for escape from fire. They were at present inspected for those two purposes by the London County Council. If this clause was retained a good deal of pecuniary liability would be inflicted upon these charitable societies, who did an immense amount of good work in giving shelter at night to poor people who had no place of their own to go to. The County Council felt that at the present moment they did not wish to rush into hasty legislation which might inflict a deadly blow on these societies, Church of England and Roman Catholic alike, which had done so much to help the poor in the past; they desired to to wait until the whole bearing of the question had been considered. The Parliamentary Committee of the County Council now in power had not had time to consider and decide on this complicated Bill, and the House ought to realise that it was not for any sectarian motive that they now asked that the consideration of this clause should be postponed, but for the reason he had given and that reason alone.

*MR. CLELAND (Glasgow, Bridgeton) said he found himself in the curious situation, as an old member of the County Council, of asking the House to pass this Bill, whilst the hon. Gentleman who was a member of the party now in power on the County Council was heading an attack on the General Powers Bill as modified by the present Parliamentary Committee of that body. The Bill now before the House was not the Bill it pretended to be. The new County Council had seen fit to omit a number of its provisions, but he would not ask the House to refuse a Second Reading because some provisions with which he was in perfect agreement were dropped. He regretted that Clauses 32 to 51 (excepting Clause 38) had been dropped, and he regretted that Clause 84 had been deleted; with regard to Clause 85 the action of the County Council was perfectly reasonable. Clause 85 practically altered the law of the land in a way that was bound to give considerable offence to many people who held strict views in regard to benevolent institutions. It was surely undesirable to alter the law of the land in favour of a municipal authority in a matter which excited such a strong feeling in the minds of many people in this country, and that was why he considered the authorities at Spring Gardens were perfectly right in not pressing the subject. Some of the clauses in the Bill, however, were absolutely necessary for the improvement of London. They were clauses relating more or less to matters of internal economy. One was to amend the superannuation fund, to make it easier for the County Council to hand over to the relatives of those who died the money due to them under the superannuation scheme. The whole of the Bill, with the exception of Clause 85, was practically non-controversial, and therefore he asked the House to give it a Second Reading.

*SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton) desired to emphasise the fact that this was not a Roman Catholic question at all, but a question which affected all charitable institutions, who were much grieved at the way they were to be treated under the clauses that were now dropped. He was able to speak with authority as a member of the committee of the Refuge and Reformatory Union, whose record of service in rescue and educational work all over the country extended over fifty years. On their behalf he heartily supported the proposal that additional time should be given to consider this question. It was one that should be dealt with in some way, but not in the way proposed in Clause 85, which had now been dropped.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said he would be the very last person to wish to subject any philanthropic institution to the inspection of the County Council, but he wished to say on the general principle that the Bill as printed was not the Bill that the House was asked to consider. The hon. Member who moved its Second Reading admitted that. He would not say in what way it was altered although he admitted that Clause 85 was withdrawn. So far as he could gather there was some arrangement in regard to other clauses. He did not object to those arrangements nor had he any objection to the Bill being modified in any way its promoters desired, but he did object to being asked to vote for a Bill blindfold.

* MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.), as one whose name was on the back of the Bill, desired to say that he cordially associated himself with what had been said by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Honiton Division of Devon. Part 5 of the Bill was left out, and it had been decided to leave out Part 6 together with Clauses 84 and 85. While efficient inspection of some kind was necessary, he thought it was wise on this occasion to avoid, if possible, hurting the feelings of those who did excellent work in connection with charitable institutions. It was not the feelings of only one section of the Christian community that had been hurt but of many sections, including the Church of England. He therefore associated himself with those who desired to drop Clause 85.

* MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) said he desired to associate himself most heartily with those who supported the decision to withdraw Clauses 84 and 85, but he really rose for the purpose of asking the sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for a class of persons whose interests appeared to have been overlooked in Clause 64 which dealt with superannuation. Under the London School Board there was connected with the teachers a superannuation fund to which they contributed. When the London County Council took over the work of the School Board the superannuation fund was still continued, but it was not allowed that new teachers should become members of the old superannuation fund. The result had been that the remaining members of the original fund naturally found that they were becoming older every year and were becoming an increasing burden on the shrinking fund. If the County Council allowed the members of the original fund to come in under their scheme, and provision might be made under Section 64 to enable that to be done, then what appeared to be a very grave wrong would be removed. Under the present arrangement, unless those who died off were allowed to be replaced by those who were coming on — the new teachers — necessarily the original funds must be entirely cleared out, and those who were not allowed to come in under Clause 64, but only allowed to appeal to the previous existing fund, now being ruined, ran the risk of losing the benefit which they ought to have obtained from continuous contributions spread over a considerable number of years. If this subject might have the consideration of the President of the Local Government Board, he was sure that a suggestion to the London County Council would be all that was required, and the chance of this grave wrong being continued would, he thought, at once pass away.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.) said Clauses 84 and 85 no doubt had been put in the Bill by the County Council to meet an existing grievance, and apparently it was not a question of whether the Clause was right or wrong, but one of expediency. He did not know whether they were acting out of sympathy with regard to these charitable institutions, some of them Roman Catholic, in reference to which appeals were coming from all sides at present. The question was whether it was a just thing from the point of view of the inmates of these institutions to exclude these clauses. The hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had said that other clauses were to be deleted. He understood that they were going to pass the Bill as a whole. If the Bill got the Second Reading that night it would be read with the clauses in it, and the deleting of Clauses 84 and 85, with others, would take place in Committee. He would like to know whether the deleting of the clauses was for the purpose of making the Bill more suitable for its objects, or whether it was intended for the gratification of Members of the Opposition. If every Member of the House could negotiate with the County Council in regard to Bills which they promoted and say, "If you do not take out such and such a clause we will oppose it," then they would not know where they stood. He was sure that the Local Government Board would not allow that course to be followed, or if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of that Department did so his opinion with regard to him would be very much changed. When the right hon. Gentleman was on that side of the House, he noticed that one of the things he very often protested against was interference with the rights of the County Council. It was for the London County Council to satisfy the House that there was a further reason for deleting these clauses than the gratification of the hon. Member for Kerry or the satisfaction of the Nationalist Party. If they proved that the inmates of these places were going to be better cared for without supervision and inspection, he thought the House might accept that assurance. It was not fair to ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading with certain clauses in it, and that the Bill should then go to Committee where those clauses would be deleted, so that the measure which came from Committee would not be that to which they had given a Second Reading. He asked the right hon. Gentleman seriously to consider the matter, and not to consent to it because of a threatened opposition from any part of the House.

LORD R. CECIL said he had been informed by the promoters of the Bill what line they desired to take about it. On every private Bill it was essential that the promoters should negotiate with opponents where they thought those opponents were justified in their opposition. They must be ready, of course, in Committee, to frame the Bill in such a way as on the whole would meet the objects they had in view. They had to consider the Bill as a whole, and they had told certain opponents they intended to strike out this particular clause and other clauses to meet the objections that had been made. Of course, this clause had nothing to do with Roman Catholics especially; the Church of England and Nonconformists desired the exclusion of the clause, but not because they objected to inspection at all. They had no objection to inspection, but they objected to the form of inspection proposed. They thought it was not the right form of inspection to treat these refuges as if they were common lodging-houses, and that to ask a certain kind of inspector to inspect these refuges as lodging-houses would lead to injustice and render the work exceedingly difficult to carry out, while it would cast an unnecessary slur upon the institutions concerned.

LORD R. CECIL said he was not in a position to speak for them all. He understood that in the case of those with which he had made himself acquainted, they were perfectly willing to have a suitable form of inspection. The County Council had this opposition to deal with, and having a very complicated measure to prepare in a very short time, they had come to the conclusion that it would be better to drop the clause, at any rate for the present, in order that the matter might be reconsidered and dealt with in the future in a more satisfactory way. It was only right to say that the County Council had shown themselves very zealous and hard-working in dealing with this Bill, discussing all its clauses and informing themselves thoroughly, as they had done, as to the provisions of the measure.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a second time, and committed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE) (TERMINATION OF PROCEEDINGS THEREON).

Postponed Proceedings on Question, "That the Proceedings on the Motions with respect to Business of the House (Procedure) shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday, the 16th day of April, in the following manner, and subject to the following provisions:—1. At 10 p.m. on that day, Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith the Question on any Amendment or other Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments or other Motions moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but on no other Amendment or Motion), and on any other Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings to be concluded; 2. On that day the proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House; 3. On that day no dilatory Motion, nor Motion for Adjournment under Standing Order No. 10, shall be received unless moved by a Minister of the Crown, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith without debate; 4. Any opposed Private Business which has been set down for consideration on that day shall stand adjourned without Question put until such other day as the Chairman of Ways and Means may determine,"—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman,)—resumed.

Question again proposed.

Mr. EVELYN CECIL, continuing his speech in support of his Amendment giving an additional day to the discussion, said that a good many additional reasons had already been brought forward why the Government should allow a little more time for the discussion of the proposed Rules. They had not yet discussed the important question whether an hon. Member should be allowed to speak more than once upon the Report Stage, although the Prime Minister had promised that concession. Instead of carrying out his promise, the Prime Minister had put down an Amendment which practically limited the right of speaking more than once to the Member in charge of the Bill. He considered that the Government had approached very near to a breach of faith in the matter, and that was one of the reasons why they should be allowed more time. They had been discussing for some time the Question of allotting Grand Committees to different portions of the United Kingdom, and if the Resolution were adopted that policy of disintegration would be forced through without a semblance of discussion. There were other objections to the course pursued by the Government. One was the want of publicity which would necessarily attend the discussion of Bills in Grand Committees, for those discussions would take place with far less publicity than if they were discussed in a Committee of the House. They had not been told what would happen to the Bills committed to Grand Committees.

MR. AINSWORTH (Argyllshire), on a point of order, asked if the hon. Member was speaking to the terms of his Amendment.

*MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. Member is arguing that more time should be allowed. Of course, it will not be in order to discuss the various questions for which he is asking for more time.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) asked if the hon. Member was in order in discussing questions which had already been settled by a vote of the House?

MR. EVELYN CECIL said he was simply enumerating reasons why he thought more time ought to be given to the discussion of the proposed Rules, and he thought he had given three or four very good reasons. He wished to know were the Grand Committees to remain sitting during the ordinary sittings of the House? That was a point which required elucidation. None of the questions he had mentioned could be discussed if the Resolution passed as it stood. Therefore they naturally desired that more time should be given. He was not asking for very much. His Amendment merely asked half a day, Wednesday night being a private Members' night. There was nothing extravagant in his proposal, and it was one that offered some ground for compromise. The Prime Minister himself had said he regretted that they had not in this Parliament been able to make "deals" between the two sides as before. Why did not the Government consent to some arrangement? The perpetual determination not to give way or to make any "deal" on questions of this kind was necessarily a source of irritation and unpleasantness, and generally in the long run it could not fail to have the effect of making opposition to the Government proposals more bitter and more strenuous. It was for that reason that he pleaded with the Government to accept his Amendment. He thought it would remove a good deal of bitterness and unpleasantness. The House would then have an opportunity of discussing the important questions he had mentioned, and they would be in better humour with each other, perhaps, for the greater part of the session. He thought the Government had plenty of time. It was understood that the Government had dropped the Licensing Bill. They had to all intents and purposes dropped the Irish University Bill. Two highly controversial measures had, therefore, been removed from the list of Bills to be passed this session. Perhaps he might even say it had been rumoured that there was to be no Home Rule Bill. At any rate, there would be considerable time at the disposal of the Government if they were going to devote the rest of the session to the disintegration of the Army and the destruction of the landlords. There would be nothing like the pressure on the time of the House which certainly there would have been if they had introduced those other Bills. He thought it would be a good omen for the discussion of the measures they intended to proceed with if they would grant the moderate request for half a day more to discuss what were really non-Party matters affecting the procedure of the House.

SIR F. BANBURY seconded the Amendment. He said that when he addressed a few remarks to the House earlier in the afternoon, he was singularly fortunate in having the pleasure and the honour of being listened to by the President of the Board of Education. That was about five o'clock, and the right hon. Gentleman was then the only occupant of the Treasury Bench, and now at twenty minutes past nine the right hon. Gentleman was still there. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to occupy the position of maid of all work to the Government. He did not criticise the capability of the right hon.

Gentleman to fill that or any other position, but he rose to call attention to the absence of the Prime Minister. This was the most important question that had been before the House in this generation. [MINISTERIAL laughter.] He was surprised to hear that laughter. The new rules were designed to stifle free discussion. One of the reasons why the Opposition asked for further discussion was that the proposals would put still greater powers in the hands of the Executive, and he would remind the House that on 6th February, 1902, when new Rules of Procedure were then being discussed, the Prime Minister said—

> "We must take care that we do not, wittingly or unwittingly, exalt the power of the Executive and diminish the control of the House at large. Facilitate the progress of business as much as you like; make it as reasonable and as easy as you like; but do not do anything which will have the effect of placing the House of Commons more and more at the mercy of the Government of the day."

They wanted more time to discuss these Rules in order to get assurances from the Government that they did not intend to violate the excellent principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. One of the reasons why the right hon. Gentleman would not give an extra half-day was that he knew perfectly well that he and his friends were unable to answer the arguments advanced by the Opposition. He felt sure that the right hon. Gentleman, in view of the words which he had just quoted, would assent to the Amendment of his hon. friend.

> "In line 2, after the word 'shall,' to insert the words 'be taken on Tuesday and.'"—(Mr. Evelyn Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR HENRY CRAIK appealed to the Prime Minister to consider whether he could not make this concession. He had no doubt there were good reasons for the absence of the Prime Minister from so important a debate, but he would point out that certain grave inconvenience arose from his absence. Arguments were addressed to the Front Bench and especially to the Prime Minister, and in his absence they were entirely overlooked, or when he came in at occasional intervals he spoke without the slightest regard to the fact that those arguments had been advanced. The small Amendment which his hon. friend had proposed would give them a little time for the discussion of the important proposal for the setting up a special Scottish Standing Committee. The Prime Minister had said that there was practically unanimity in Scotland in favour of the proposal, but he absolutely denied that.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said that the question whether or not there was unanimity in favour of the proposal was not now under discussion.

SIR HENRY CRAIK remarked that in an Amendment of the same character the Prime Minister was allowed to use the argument of unanimity; but he maintained that there was no such unanimity, and a longer time was required to discuss the matter which ought not to be passed sub silentio to-morrow. The Prime Minister had also stated that the new Rule was practically the Resolution passed in 1894 and 1895. If the right hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to be present during the debate, he would have heard that argument refuted. The Resolutions passed in 1894 and 1895 were merely Sessional Orders.

*MR. DEPUTY-SPEAKER said the hon. Member must confine himself to the matter as it affected the question of allowing an additional half day.

SIR HENRY CRAIK contended that he had a right to show that it was not a fair argument to limit the time for the discussion of the new Rule that there was absolute unanimity in Scotland, and that it was identical with the Resolutions passed in 1894 and 1895 [MINISTERIAL cries of "Order"]; and he was not going to be stopped by a dozen Deputy Chairmen on the other side.

*MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said that the hon. Member was again disregarding his ruling, and he must ask him to keep to the Question before the House.

SIR HENRY CRAIK said he bowed to the Deputy Speaker's ruling. He was not entitled, as he understood, to bring forward these arguments in refutation of the arguments used by the Prime Minister. He considered that the demand pressed upon the Government was a very moderate one, which, if there was any desire to meet the legitimate claims of Scotland, ought certainly to be conceded.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) said he desired to support the Amendment for reasons entirely different from those given by the last speaker. The power of closure and of consequential closure to be given to the Chairmen of Grand Committees would, under the arrangement proposed by the Government, be sanctioned without discussion, although it was the most important point that yet remained to be debated. There was a further Amendment on the point of which he had given notice, but which he supposed would be defeated. It seemed to him that the Chairmen of Grand Committees had already ample powers of closure, without this further power of closuring consequential Amendments. They could always rely on the Speaker and Deputy Speaker to take a fair and reasonable view as to when consequential closure might be allowed; but they should not give to the five or six Chairmen of the Grand Committees, who were Party men, and had not the same exalted position as the Speaker and the Deputy-Speaker, the power to rule out of discussion whole pages of Amendments. He objected, as an independent Member, to this great power of consequential closure being conferred upon any Party man who perhaps expected to be appointed as a Charity Commissioner for the manner in which he had carried out his duties as a Chairman of a Grand Committee.

MR. PIRIE said that although he was a sufferer himself from the fact that matters affecting Scotland might not be fully discussed, he wished to protest against the exhibition of dilatory tactics on the other side, by which hours had been wasted that might have been devoted to the discussion of matters in which the whole House was really interested.

Ordered, That the Proceedings on the Motions with respect to Business of the House (Procedure) shall, if not previously brought to a conclusion, be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday, the 16th day of April, in the following manner, and subject to the following provisions :—1. At ten p.m. on that day, Mr. SPEAKER shall put forthwith the Question or any Amendment or other Motion already proposed from the Chair, and shall next proceed successively to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments or other Motions moved by the Government of which notice has been given (but on no other Amendment or Motion), and on any other Question necessary to dispose of the Proceedings to be concluded; 2. On that day the proceedings to which this Order relates shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House; 3. On that day no dilatory Motion, nor Motion for Adjournnent under Standing Order No. 10, shall be received unless moved by a Minister of the Crown, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith without debate; 4. Any opposed Private Business which has been set down for consideration on that day shall stand adjourned without Question put until such other day as the Chairman of Ways and Means may determine.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [11th April] to Question [20th March]—"(1) When a Bill has been read a second time it shall stand committed to one of the Standing Committees, unless the House, on Motion to be decided without Amendment or debate, otherwise order, and such a Motion shall not require notice, must be made immediately after the Bill is read a second time, may be made by any Member, and may, though opposed, be decided after the expiration of the time for opposed business. But this Order shall not apply to—(a) Bills for imposing taxes, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills; or (b) Bills for confirming Provisional Orders. (2) The House may, on Motion made by the Member in charge of a Bill, commit the Bill to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions, and to a Committee of the Whole House in respect of other provisions. If such a Motion is opposed the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes and from the Member who opposes the Motion, shall, without further debate, put the Question thereon."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Which Amendment was—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, '(c) Bills dealing with the organisation of the Army or Reserve Forces, or with the Navy.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN desired to ask the Prime Minister if he would inform the House of the principle upon which the Government had founded their proposed Standing Order. They had made particular exceptions. He excluded from the Bills automatically sent upstairs unless the House otherwise ordered on division Bills imposing taxes and certain small Bills. Bills imposing taxation was the important exception. The particular exception they were now asked to make was as to Bills in regard to the Army. He asked the Government why they thought it necessary to retain finance Bills in the House and to refuse to retain Army Bills. He shared the view of his right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition that their financial procedure was unnecessarily cumbrous, and that a good deal of it was explicable by our past history. It had no practical reference to our present circumstances. The special jealousy with which the House regarded their financial Bills, and the special safeguards with which they had hedged about their passage, were really the outcome of the time when the House of Commons depended upon its power in two respects—in the first place, its power over money and grants to the Crown; and, in the second place, its power over the armed forces of the Crown. Any student of history would bear him out when he said that the House of Commons in those days regarded with equal jealousy any permanent grant of money to the Crown and any Bill authorising the Crown to maintain a land force or military disciplined force. In those days the jealousy of the House was maintained with regard to both the Army and finance. But the present Government maintained all the jealousy with regard to finance, but did not apply it to the Army. If he remembered aright the Army Bill in its preamble began by saying: "It is inexpedient to maintain and contrary to law," and that the powers should be only annual. They were ready to hedge about their financial system with safeguards; why should they be justified in abandoning the same safeguards in regard to military matters? He really asked the question with a desire for information. He had had, as it happened, to do with their financial procedure, though he had had little to do with the Army, except that for a short time he had to find the money to pay for it. He was quite at a loss to conceive any reason for retaining all the safeguards in regard to finance Bills, which did equally apply to Bills dealing with the Army. Therefore he desired to know what distinction the Government drew between the two. Bearing in mind that finance Bills of considerable importance might be brought in dealing with a considerable amount of details, it might be of great interest to future Chancellors of the Exchequer to know what determined the Government at the present time to preserve for finance Bills a series of restrictions which they did not think necessary in the case of any other Bills.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he certainly thought that other people required some enlightenment as well as the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He required some as to the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. Now it appeared that they were doubtful whether there should be any particular sanctity in money Bills. Last week when they were discussing the Amendment of the hon. Member for Liverpool, the right hon. Gentleman thought that the Government's proposal for the safeguarding of money Bills was not strong enough. Now the Government were asked why they preserved these obsolete and out-of-date precautions.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: That is not what I said. I asked the Government what was the logic of their distinction. I have logic of my own, but I cannot discover any logic in their proposal.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman said a good deal more. He said that for his part he doubted whether these rules as to money Bills were necessary at all.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: No.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I spoke of Resolutions.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, no; the right hon. Gentleman spoke of their treating them as if they were in a separate category altogether. That had always been done. That was the rule of the House. The Hartington Committee, in 1886, recommended—

"That every public Bill, after the Second Reading, except a Bill originating in Committee of Ways and Means, or a Bill for the Confirmation of any Provisional Order, unless the House shall otherwise order, shall be referred to a Standing Committee of the Whole House."

Among the members of that Committee were Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Bright, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Courtney, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Healy, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Sir John Mowbray, Mr. Sexton, and Mr. W. H. Smith. It was a formidable list of names. Therefore, the Government also thought it was a reasonable thing to exempt these Bills. Now, it was asked, why not make a similar exemption of Army Bills? He did not remember that, in the early seventies, when there was a great reform of the Army, the Army Bills were treated in an exceptional manner. He did not know any particular reason why such a Bill should not be sent to a Standing Committee, but if there were such a reason, the House could refuse to send the Bill upstairs. Every Bill must stand on its own footing, but there was no sufficient ground for saying that every measure connected with the Army must be exempt from the ordinary procedure adopted for other Bills. He had answered the questions put by the right hon Gentleman as fully as he could, and he did not think there was much force in the point he sought to make, that if money Bills were exempt Army Bills should be exempt as well.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the only reason given by the Prime Minister for drawing a distinction as to these Bills was that a similar line of distinction had been drawn by the Hartington Committee. But the Hartington Committee did not take any pains when they had the power to turn their Report into an actuality, and some of the most important recommendations of that Committee were being rejected by the Government. Nothing in the nature of a reason had been given by the Prime Minister as to why the distinction between money Bills and Army Bills had been drawn, and what the Opposition pressed for was a reason for the plan of the Government. Surely that was not a very strange request. The Opposition denied the proposition that the distinction should be made because money Bills were important and other Bills were not. But it was not on the point of importance that the exception was made. Could it be on the point of constitutional precedent? If that was the reason, then the sanctity which attached to money Bills also attached to Bills dealing with the forces of the Crown. If the Government contended that in regard to money Bills they were justified in putting them into this exceptional category, they had a right to ask what was the reason for this exception and why it should not include other very important matters, one of which they were now discussing, and another of which it would be their duty to discuss immediately. He appealed to every hon. Member who had heard the Prime Minister's speech to say whether the right hon. Gentleman had given a single reason for the exception which he intended to introduce which did not apply with equal force to other measures. He would leave the House to judge whether there had been a complete reply, or any attempt to reply to the arguments which had been put forward by the Opposition.

*MR. ABEL SMITH said they had been told that they were wasting the time of the House in discussing such an Amendment as this. What they were trying to impress upon the Government was that in these revolutionary changes in the Rules of Procedure they should at least be consistent. If it was right to make an exception in the case of Bills imposing taxation, why was it not equally right that exceptions should be made in the case of Bills dealing with the forces of the Crown? His hon. friends had pointed out that these two classes of Bills had almost equal historic sanction. They knew how jealous the House had always been with regard to its powers over the finances of the nation. They also knew that ever since there had been a Standing Army, as now understood in this country, the House had always exercised equal jealousy over its control of that force. Now the Government proposed to make a revolutionary change. They were sweeping away what the Prime Minister called archaic safeguards. If they made exceptions with regard to Bills dealing with the finances of the country, they ought also to make exceptions with regard to Bills dealing with the Standing Army, over the strength, finance, and discipline of which the House had always maintained a substantial and annual control.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said he wished to move the exception of Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom; Bills to give effect to treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements; and Bills to sanction the cession of any territory forming part of the dominions of the Crown. There were no reasons in favour of the exemption of finance Bills that would not equally apply to the three categories he had mentioned, and, notwithstanding any impatience the Prime Minister and his supporters might display, it was desirable that the Amendment should be moved in order that the Opposition might be able to mark their sense of the imperfections and reckless character of the Government Resolutions. Except by moving this Amendment the Opposition would have no way of getting a permanent record of their protest. As to the first category, Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom, such Bills did not fall within the class of those which took away or modified the powers of this House. In all Home Rule Bills, there was invariably the Pharisaical claim that there was a complete reservation of the most absolute powers of the House. But if the Second Reading of such a Bill was assented to and it was sent upstairs to Grand Committee there would be no effective reservation at all. As to the second category, of Bills to give effect to treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements, right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite would, without such an exception, have sent the Sugar Convention Bill to a Grand Committee upstairs; and under the class of Bills which sanctioned the cession of any territory forming part of the dominions of the Crown, they would have sent to a Committee upstairs the Bill sanctioning the cession of the island of Heligoland to Germany. When the last named Bill was under discussion the late Mr. Gladstone delivered a most powerful address to the House in favour of the view that such matters should not be submitted to Parliament by Bill but if such subjects were to be dealt with by Parliament it ought to be by the House as a whole. He would remind the Prime Minister and those responsible for the new Standing Orders that none of them made it in any way compulsory to keep to be dealt within the House itself Bills which came within any one of the three classes he had mentioned. There would always be a power to submit the familiar Motion to send such Bills to a Committee upstairs unless an Amendment of this kind were agreed to. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 10, at end, to add '(c) Bills relating to the maintenance, organisation, or discipline of the Navy or the naval service; (d) Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom; (e) Bills to give effect to treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements; (f) Bills to sanction the cession of any territory forming part of the dominions of the Crown.' "—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

CAPTAIN CRAIG said that the Prime Minister earlier in the evening had stated that, if the Opposition had taken the opportunity which was given to them on Thursday last of casting their eyes upon the various Amendments upon the Paper and selecting those which were most vital, this guillotine Motion would not have been necessary. Following that advice, he thought that the most vital Amendment was that which excluded from the consideration of the Grand Committees, Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom. He looked with the greatest possible dread upon Bills of that character being taken away from the Committee of the Whole House. Of course he had in his mind the case of Ireland, and it was in view of the conflicting statements which had been made from time to time from the Treasury Bench that he had no doubt the Prime Minister and the Cabinet contemplated that a number of Bills of this character would be brought before the House for consideration. He believed, however, if it was the intention of the Prime Minister and his Government to lay the foundation stone of Home Rule for Ireland by introducing such a Bill and sending it upstairs to a Grand Committee, where those who were interested might or might not be represented in the proportion which they would like to see, they would inflict the gravest possible injury on the Committee work of the House. He had always endeavoured since he entered the House, however imperfectly, to voice the sentiments fairly and squarely of those who returned him, and if this proposal were carried a great deal of the power of representation and many of the privileges which one was supposed to enjoy would be taken away. If Bills of such tremendous purport and moment were permitted to go to a Grand Committee upstairs, where debate was not conducted in the same manner as in the House and where the light of day would not, so to speak, be admitted, hon. Members would not be able to realise as a whole what was being done and how it was being one. He was strengthened in that view by the fact that he learned from various Ministers that it was their intention to introduce legislation which closely affected the people of Ireland. The Prime Minister had stated that it was their intention to introduce very shortly a measure dealing with what he called "the better government of Ireland," or in other words "the association of the people of Ireland with the management of their affairs." If it was the intention of the Government to pass that Bill through without allowing hon. members a fair opportunity of discussing it, he thought it would be a crying shame. Such a policy must inevitably rebound on the heads of those Members of the Government who had engineered this method of dealing with business to the disadvantage of the minority in the House. He was glad, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman had moved this particular Amendment which he claimed exhibited great common sense and reasonableness.

And, it being Eleven of the Clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

NURSES AND PRIVATE NURSING HOMES (REGISTRATION).

Bill to provide for the better Training and Registratien of Nurses and for the voluntary Registration of Private Nursing Homes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Claude Hay and Sir Arthur Bignold.

NURSES AND PRIVATE NURSING HOMES (REGISTRATION) BILL.

"To provide for the better Training and Registration of Nurses and for the voluntary Registration of Private Nursing Homes," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 157.]

ADJOURNMENT—EFFECT OF NEW RULES ON EXISTING STANDING COMMITTEES.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the House do now adjourn.—(Mr. George Whiteley.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether, at the conclusion of the debate on the proposal to substitute four new Standing Committees for the existing Standing Committees at ten o'clock to-morrow night, the existing Standing Committees would be automatically abolished. One of those Standing Committees was dealing with the feeding of school children, and was to meet to-morrow. He would be glad to know what was the position of the existing Committees and of the Bills before them. It seemed to be absurd that a Committee should meet and attempt to do work on the very eve of their demise.

MR. HALDANE replied that in the Standing Orders there were no words relating to the deposition of Committees. It could only be a de facto supersession, and they might pass resolutions as they liked, but, until the Committee of Selection or some other body had set up these new Committees, there was no de facto abolition of the existing machinery, therefore the old machinery went on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said these Committees were not formally abolished, but the contemplated effect of the new Standing Order was to abolish them. He would like to have the view of the Speaker as to the actual status of the old Committees, as to how the work of the old Committees could be carried on by the new Committees, and as to how a Bill which had been before an old Committee could be suddenly transferred to a new Committee.

MR. HALDANE asked the Speaker's opinion whether until the new Committees were de facto set up the old Committees had ceased to exist.

*MR. SPEAKER said he was really not in a position to answer the question. If the right hon. Gentleman would repeat his question to-morrow, he would endeavour by that time to arrive at a solution.

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should never have thought of raising this question without some previous reference to Mr. Speaker or the Government, but the point was only brought to his attention a few minutes before.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) asked whether it would be in order for a Committee to disregard the Order of the House, and whether these Committees would not remain in existence until they had completed the work which had been sent to them by the House.

MR. STANLEY WILSON said there were two Grand Committees now in existence, the Committee on Law and the Committee on Trade, each consisting of eighty members, and yet the Government intended to set up four new Grand Committees which would absorb another 320 Members. He would like Mr. Speaker to consider what would be the feelings of Members who were nominated on these new Grand Committees.

*MR. SPEAKER said he did not think that question came before him. The question was whether the work of the Standing Committees was to be continued by the new Committees which were about to be set up or whether the Resolution of the House to-morrow would put an end to the old Committees. As he had said, he would consider the matter, and if the right hon. Gentleman would put his Question to-morrow at Question time he would give him the best Answer he could.

Question put, and agreed to.

Adjourned at a quarter after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had laid upon the Table the Certificates from the Examiners that the further Standing Orders applicable to the following Bills have been complied with:—Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 1); London Government Scheme (Southwark Borough Market).

Also the Certificate that the Standing Orders applicable to the following Bill have not been complied with:—Electric Supply Corporation [H.L.].

The same were ordered to lie on the Table.

BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Regulations for the preliminary instruction of elementary school teachers.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

NAVAL AND MARINE PAY AND PENSION ACT, 1865.

Order in Council, dated 26th March, 1907, approving a memorial of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty in regard to the pay of men of the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve who have qualified in signalling or wireless telegraphy. Laid before the House (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

THE STANDING ORDERS.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, I ask your Lordships to make an alteration in your Standing Orders to allow interest to be paid during construction of railways at the rate of 4 per cent. instead of 3 per cent. per annum. This alteration in the Standing Orders has already been made in another place. As your Lordships are probably aware, it is very difficult now to raise capital at 3 per cent., and a very strong representation has been made to the authorities in both Houses of Parliament to allow interest at 4 per cent. I beg to move that your Lordships agree to the proposed alteration in the Standing Orders.

Moved, That Standing Order No. 128 be amended as follows:—

[NOTE.—The word in small capitals is to be omitted, and the word printed in Italics is to be inserted.]

128. A clause shall be inserted in every Railway Bill prohibiting the payment of any interest or dividend out of any capital which the company have been or may be authorised to raise, either by means of calls, or of any power of borrowing, to any shareholder on the amount of the calls made in respect of the shares held by him, except such interest on money advanced by any shareholder beyond the amount of the calls actually made as is in conformity with the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland)

Act, 1845, as the case may be; and except such interest (if any) as the Committee on the Bill may, according to the circumstances of the case, think fit to allow, subject always to the following conditions:—(1) That the rate of interest allowed by the Committee do not in any case exceed THREE four per centum per annum; (2) That interest be allowed to be paid in respect only of the time allowed by the Bill for the completion of the railway, or such less time as the Committee think fit; (3) That payment of interest be not allowed to begin until the Railway Company have deposited with the Board of Trade a statutory declaration by two of the directors and the secretary of the company to the effect that two-thirds at least of the share capital authorised by the Bill, in respect whereof interest may be paid, have been actually issued and accepted, and are held by shareholders, who, or whose executors, administrators, successors, or assigns, are legally liable for the same; (4) That interest do not accrue in favour of any shareholder for any time during which any call on any of his shares is in arrear; (5) That the aggregate amount to be so paid for interest be estimated and stated in the Bill, and be not deemed capital within Standing Order 112; (6) That notice of the company having power so to pay interest out of capital be given in every prospectus, advertisement, or other document of the company inviting subscriptions for shares, and in every certificate of shares; and (7) That the half-yearly accounts of the company do show the amount on which, and the rate at which, interest has been paid. And the company may be authorised by the Bill to pay interest accordingly, but not further or otherwise.—(The Earl of Onslow.)

On Question, Motion agreed to.

MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATION BILL [H.L.].

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH: My Lords, I ask leave to postpone the Second Reading of this Bill until Monday next. I apologise to any noble Lords who have been inconvenienced by coming down to-day, and I take the opportunity of saying that I shall definitely move the Second Reading on Monday.

[SECOND READING.]

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, I do not propose to make any speech in moving the Second Reading of this Bill. There is nothing novel in its character. Certain Amendments have been rendered necessary by the Act of last year, and I have caused a Memorandum to be issued which is now on the Table of your Lordships' House explaining those Amendments. They are all of a drafting, and in some cases of a technical, character, and I do not think I need detain your Lordships further in moving the Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Earl of Portsmouth.)

On Question, Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 16*th April*, 1907.

Population of Ireland and Scotland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, having regard to the fact that the population of Ireland has decreased from 8,175,124 in 1841 to 4,387,887 on 30th June, 1906, he can state, for the purposes of comparison, the population of Scotland in 1841 and the estimated population in 1906.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The population of Scotland, as at the Census of 1841, was 2,620,184, and at the middle of the year (30th June) 1906 was estimated at 4,726,070.

MR. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether their Lordships have under consideration the question of the pay and position of the plumbers and plumbers' mates of the Royal Navy; whether he is aware that, as mechanics, their trade is the lowest paid in the Navy; that no increase of pay has been given since the rating of plumber was introduced into His Majesty's service over forty years ago, whilst all other branches have obtained concessions, in some way or other, as regards pay and obtained the rating of chief petty officer; that, by being unable to attain that rating, they are unable to obtain an increase of pay whilst serving and are also debarred from receiving an extra halfpenny per day for that rating on being pensioned; and that they are not in receipt of the 2d. per day granted to some ratings for re-engaging and no progressive pay of any description is granted.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The question of the pay and position of plumbers has been considered in the past, and no reason is seen for its reconsideration at the present time. The rating is among the lowest paid of the artisan class as the work requires less skill than that of the more highly paid classes. The rating was established in 1860, with pay at the rate of 2s. 3d. a day (continuous service); this rate was increased to 2s. 5d. in 1864, and again to 3s. in 1867. It may be mentioned that some of the concessions to other classes have been in the direction of equalising their pay with that of plumbers. There are other ratings who do not rise to chief petty officers, e.g., blacksmiths, coopers, painters. As plumbers do not serve as chief petty officers they are ineligible for the addition to pension which is granted only for service as such. Re-engagement pay of 2d. a day is only given to seamen ratings. Plumbers' mates, being second class petty officers, receive an increase of pay on advancement to the rating of plumber (first class petty officer). They are also eligible for additional pay according to the number of good conduct badges earned.

Comptroller and Auditor General—Pensions and Honours.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state how many Comptroller and Auditor Generals retired on pension during the last thirty years; how many of these received the honour of knighthood whilst actively serving and on retirement on pension respectively; and how many retired on pension without receiving this honour.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The Board of Treasury have no information on the points referred to in the hon. Member's Question.

Promotion to Second Division Clerks of Abstractors (Assistant Clerks).

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether abstractors (assistant clerks) who show the necessary qualifications for promotion to the Second Division are entitled to such promotion, according to the regulations under which they enter, after six years' service, including service as boy clerks up to two years; and what is the total length of service, including service as boy clerks up to two years, of each of the six senior abstractors in the Exchequer and Audit Department.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Under Clause 15 of the Order in Council of the 29th November, 1898, an assistant clerk who has had not less than six years established service may receive, on the recommendation of the head of his department and with the approval of the Treasury, appointment to the Second Division. But the Order directs that such appointments are only to be made upon grounds of merit and in exceptional cases. By a later Order not less than one nor more than two years service as boy clerk may be reckoned. I am informed that none of the six abstractors referred to has had more than four years and four months service.

Government Audit of Irish Public Accounts.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the names of the public accounts in Ireland to which a partial local audit is given in Ireland each year by the Exchequer and Audit Department, the number of officials employed on each account in this local test, and the number of weeks in each year during which each of those officials is so employed.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I am informed that the following accounts are subject to a partial local audit in Ireland each year:—Army, Irish Command; Public Works (including Local Loans); Ordnance Survey; Board of Trade; Department of Agriculture; Chief Secretary for Ireland; County Court Officers; Irish Land Commission; Irish Church Temporalities; Congested Districts Board; Reformatory and Industrial Schools; Public Education; Post Office. The time occupied by the examination varies considerably in each case, and the Comptroller and Auditor General is not prepared to furnish details. In the aggregate twenty officers are occupied on the work in Ireland for seven weeks, which represents the services of three officers throughout the year. In addition a partial audit is given at longer intervals to the following accounts:—Navy. Haulbowline Dockyard. Army. Store Accounts. Prisons. Dundrum Asylum. Customs. Inland Revenue. Telegraphs.

Saturday Half-Holiday in Irish Government Offices.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in a number of public departments (including the Post Office, Inland Revenue Office, Custom House, Admiralty, India Office, and Board of Education) a half-holiday is granted each Saturday to the members of the clerical staffs, and that in a few public departments this privilege is limited to alternate Saturdays; and will he say whether it is within the discretion of the heads of these latter departments to grant a weekly Saturday half-holiday, provided that the state of public business permits.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The hon. Member will find that my predecessor answered a similar Question by the hon. Member for Mid Cork on the 16th May last. I have nothing to add to that reply.

Promotion of Assistant Clerks.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, under the system of promoting assistant clerks to Second Division clerkships, as at present administered, it is possible for an assistant clerk who is eligible for this promotion in respect of service, and qualified in the opinion of the head of his department for the higher appointment, to be kept in the assistant clerks' class for an indefinite period, whereas meanwhile assistant clerks in other offices, which are better staffed or in which vacancies occur more frequently, will receive promotion; and whether he will consider some scheme by which combined service and merit will ensure promotion as allowed by the Order in Council, and by which meritorious assistant clerks may not be debarred from promotion by the non-occurrence of casual vacancies in departments to which they are assigned.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Civil servants must naturally look for promotion principally in the departments to which they are assigned, and the chances of promotion necessarily vary in the several departments. Before the Treasury could entertain a proposal to promote an assistant clerk in one department, on the ground of special merit, to the Second Division, with a view to his assignment to another department, it would be necessary that the heads of the two departments should concur in an application to the Treasury to this end; and until such a case arises I do not think that the Treasury can usefully consider the question.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the fact that sixty-six new class assistant clerks have been promoted to the Second Division, if he will state the offices in which these promotions have been made, and the respective numbers of such promotions in each office.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I learn from the Civil Service Commissioners that the total number of promotions of assistant clerks (abstractors) of the new class to the Second Division up to the 11th March, 1906, has been as follows :—

Department.	Number of Promotions.
Admiralty	5
Agriculture and Fisheries, Board of	2
Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland, Department of	3
Home Office	2
Inland Revenue	20
Irish Land Commission	1
Local Government Board (England)	2
Local Government Board (Ireland)	2
Post Office	21
Public Works Loan Board	1
Scotch Education Department	1
Stationery Office	1
War Office	5

Irish Tax Revenue.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury what proportion of the total tax revenue collected in Ireland during the years 1890, 1895, 1900, and 1905 respectively was contributed by each province.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The materials for a reply to this Question are not available.

Position of Thornley Sub-Postman and Sunderland-Boldon Rural Postman.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the Postmaster-General if he is yet in a position to report the result of his investigations as to the sub-office postman stationed at Thornley and the rural postman working between Sunderland and Boldon.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) (1) The duty of the postman at Thornley involves an attendance from 6.40 a.m. to 2 p.m., with intervals off duty amounting to two and a quarter hours, and another attendance from 7 p.m. to 8.45 p.m. His total actual attendance is, therefore, only six hours fifty minutes. Although the duty is not excessive, I find the man's attendance can, without detriment to the service, be slightly reduced by extending one of his intervals off duty in the middle of the day, and I have given instructions accordingly. His attendance will thus be reduced to six hours twenty-five minutes. The postman, to suit his own convenience, is permitted to return to his home between 2 p.m. and 7 p.m., and to use his official cycle for the purpose, the journey occupying about half an hour in each direction. The man employed on the duty was temporarily appointed, at his own request, in February last at wages of 16s. a week. His appointment has now been made permanent, and he will receive wages commencing at 17s. a week. The additional allowance of 1s. a week, referred to by the hon. Member, was for cleaning the bicycle. It will be continued. (2) The official attendance of the Sunderland to Cleadon (near Boldon) rural postman is from 6 a.m. to 10.15 a.m., from 2 p.m. to 3.45 p.m., and from 4.30 p.m. to 5.45 p.m., a total of seven and a quarter hours, of which about six hours ten minutes are occupied in actual travelling on a journey of twenty-three and a quarter miles, twelve driven and eleven and a quarter performed on foot. The postman has intervals off duty at Cleadon amounting to four and a half hours. I have given instructions for shelter to be provided for him at the expense of the Department. A revision of this post is under consideration with a view to the use of a cycle instead of a horse and cart. The change, if adopted, may involve the transfer of the present postman to another duty. The allowance made to the postman for horsekeep is intended to cover the cost of stabling at Cleadon as well as at Sunderland; but, if it is decided to maintain the mounted post, I will consider whether the allowance is adequate.

Duty in Australia on Trade Catalogues.

MR. L. HASLAM (Monmouth Boroughs): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that duty is levied in Australia on trade catalogues posted separately in large quantities to that country from the United Kingdom, while no duty is levied in the United States on similar trade catalogues, he will consider the advisability of placing the matter before the Colonial Conference with the view of the discontinuance of the practice.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I understand that this question will be discussed with the Prime Minister of Australia.

Currency of British Postal Orders in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada.

MR. L. HASLAM: To ask the Postmaster-General, in consideration of the fact that British postal orders are payable in many parts of the British Empire, while in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada such is not the case, whether he will consider the advisability of placing the matter before the Colonial Conference for consideration.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) British postal orders are payable in New Zealand, and Australia and Canada are now the only important parts of the British Empire which have not accepted the Imperial Postal Order scheme. I am in communication with the Postmasters-General of the Dominion and the Commonwealth, with a view to overcoming, if possible, the difficulties which have hitherto prevented the acceptance of the scheme in those parts of the Empire; but it is feared that there will be no time for the discussion of the question at the Colonial Conference.

Applications for Loans by Local Authorities.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): To ask the President of the Local Government Board what was the number of applications by local authorities for loans for public works pending on 31st March, 1907; what were the amounts involved; and what were the dates on which the applications were originally made, and by what authorities, and for what purpose were they made.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The particulars asked for are not immediately available, and could only be obtained after an examination of several hundred files of paper, which would involve much time and labour.

Depression in the Building Trade—Municipal Works Pending.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the depressed state of the building trade, and the probability of its not being in a normal condition, although it is improving, by next winter, he will have a schedule drawn up stating all municipal works which are at present under consideration, and endeavour to arrange for some scheme by which a proportion may be started in the various districts of the country at regular intervals.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I appreciate the object which my hon. friend has in view, but I am afraid that it would not be practicable to arrange a scheme of the kind suggested in the Question. The time for starting particular works must, I think, be left entirely to the local authorities by whom they are undertaken. I believe, however, that there is a growing tendency on the part of the larger local authorities to afford as much continuous employment as possible; and, consistently with the economic and efficient carrying out of works, the Local Government Board would desire to encourage this.

Use of Land Purchased under Loan by Municipal Authorities.

MR. BRODIE: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that it is the custom of the Local Government Board to forbid local authorities using land obtained by means of a public loan for any purpose other than that particular purpose for which it was originally bought, even when there is no covenant between the local authority and the seller of the land preventing its use by the authority for any purpose they desire; whether he is able, by administrative action, to free the hands of municipalities in this respect; whether he will take measures to do so; and whether, in the event of its not being possible to attain this object by administrative action, he will introduce legislation for the purpose at an early date.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The difficulty in this matter arises out of certain decisions of the High Court to the effect that, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, land acquired by a local authority cannot be used for any purpose other than that for which it was acquired. The difficulty cannot be removed by administrative action; but I should be glad to take advantage of any suitable opportunity of dealing with the matter by legislation.

Boarded-out Poor Law Children.

SIR GEORGE SCOTT ROBERTSON (Bradford, Central): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of Poor Law children at present maintained in the district and separate schools and in the village communities of London and of the provinces respectively.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The number of children in separate establishments of the guardians of Poor Law unions in England and Wales on the 1st January last was as follows:—

	London.	Outside London.	Total.
In district and separate schools - -	7,194	4,615	11,809

Navy—Casualties to Ships.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to the official statement furnished to the House of forty-one groundings of His Majesty's ships in 1905, whether these groundings include vessels not in the Navy List, seeing that they are not all mentioned in the Return, No. 319, of casualties to ships on the Navy List during 1905; and whether he is aware that Return No. 319 has already been shown to have omitted cases of vessels in collision.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The statement of groundings included only vessels shown in the Navy List. Cases in which a ship touches ground where no damage is done and no blame is attributable are not regarded as "casualties" for the purposes of the Return mentioned. My attention has already been called to several accidental omissions of an unimportant nature.

Police in Scotland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can state the total number of police in Scotland and the proportion per thousand of the population.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The total number of the authorised police force, excluding the Orkney and Shetland Islands and excluding additional police privately employed and paid, is 5,442. This affords approximately one policeman to 857 of the estimated population.

Payments to Seamen under Allotment Notes.

MR. L. HASLAM: To ask the President of the Board of Trade will he consider the advisability of issuing instructions that when a seaman has agreed to allot, by means of an allotment note, a portion of his wages in favour of a near relative or of a savings bank, and when the seaman has completed his voyage and the remaining portion of his wages is due, that an allotment shall be made in proportion to the amount of wages due for each completed week when less than a month's wages are due.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) Payments under allotment notes to seamen are regulated by the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts,† and especially by the Act of last session,‡ and the Board of Trade have no power to issue instructions to the effect suggested by my honourable friend.

Cost of New Asylum at Napsbury.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will state the cost per bed of the new asylum for Middlesex at Napsbury.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I beg to answer this Question on behalf of my right hon. friend. I am in communication with the visiting committee with a view to obtaining complete and accurate information as to the cost of the Napsbury Asylum per bed; and when I have done so I shall be pleased to forward it to the hon. Member.

Disposal of Site of Duke of York's School.

Major COATES (Lewisham): To ask the First Commissioner of Works when the Committee now considering the disposal of the site of the Duke of York's School at Chelsea was appointed, and of whom the Committee consists.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) The Committee, which was appointed in June, 1906, consists of:—Chairman, the Right Honourable R. K. Causton, M.P., Paymaster-General; Mr. F. D. Acland, M.P.; Major-General H. D. Hutchinson, C.S.I., Director of Staff Duties; the Honourable Sir Schomberg McDonnell, K.C.B., C.V.O., Secretary, Office of Works; Sir G. D. A. Fleetwood Wilson, K.C.B., Director of Army Finance; Secretary, Mr. B. M. Draper.

Deduction from Probate Duty and Agricultural Grants in Ireland.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the amounts to be deducted this year from the Probate Duty and agricultural grants due to each county in Ireland, and the total to be deducted from the whole of Ireland, owing to embarrassment arising from improvident prices under the Land Act of 1903; if he is aware that the amount of these deductions must now be paid in rates locally; and, if the annuities are being punctually paid, will he explain how the deductions become necessary.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The following statement shows the sums deducted in respect of land purchase from grants payable to county councils in the month of March, 1907, as determined by certificates furnished by the Irish Land Commission and the Commissioners of National Debt:—

As to the remainder of the Question I beg to refer to my Answer of yesterday to the Question of the hon. Member for North Kildare.†

Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the total number of the Royal Irish Constabulary and the proportion per thousand of the population.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The total number of the Royal Irish Constabulary, including officers, on 31st March, 1907, was 9,946. The proportion per thousand of the population of Ireland, exclusive of the Dublin metropolitan district, according to the Census of 1901, is 2·44.

Irish Elementary Education—Tests for Teachers.

MR. PIKE PEASE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if, in revising the system of elementary education in Ireland, he proposes to abolish tests for teachers and to establish public control.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) No proposals for the revision of the system of elementary education in Ireland are at present before the House.

Lavatory Accommodation at Kingston Barracks.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that in the barracks at Kingston-on-Thames, eleven miles from Hyde Park Corner and twelve miles from the War Office, the barrack rooms are still unprovided with lavatory conveniences, and the men are forced to use urinal tubs which have to be removed by hand; and whether he will take steps to remedy this state of affairs.

MR. HICKS BEACH: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that at the barracks at Kingston-upon-Thames, in order to reduce the expense of water, the water-closets used by the men are only allowed to be flushed twice a day; and whether, with a view to preventing the discouragement of recruiting and in the interests of health, he proposes to make any alterations in the existing system.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The drainage at Kingston Barracks is at present under reconstruction, and, as part of that reconstruction, the whole of the latrines, urinals, etc., used by the troops will in future be in accordance with modern sanitation. Urine tubs for night use are retained as a temporary measure. The existing water-closets are flushed twice daily without any stint of water, but when the new system is in order will be flushed as used.

Lodging Accommodation at Tidworth for Officers' Wives.

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, while provision is made at Home and Foreign stations for the wives of non-commissioned officers and men, no accommodation is provided for the wives of officers; whether, for example, at Salisbury Plain there is no accommodation for the wife of an officer within ten miles of the camp; and whether, with a view to the comfort of married officers and to retaining them in the Service, he will consider the advisability of building a proportion of small houses or bungalows which might be let to married officers at a reasonable rent.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is recognised that at Tidworth some of the officers who are entitled under the Regulations to lodging money have a difficulty in finding suitable accommodation in close proximity to the barracks, and a scheme is now being considered with a view to overcome this difficulty.

Government's Licensing Proposals.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Prime Minister whether he is yet in a position to state when the licensing legislation referred to in His Majesty's Speech will be introduced; and if the contemplated Bill will deal with the licensing question in Ireland as well as in England, or if any separate measure of licensing reform to meet the needs of Ireland will be introduced by the Government during the present session.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I am not in a position as yet to answer the first part of the hon. Member's Question. Ireland will not be included in the Bill in question, nor is it intended to introduce a separate measure dealing with Irish licences during the present session

Spurious Sports Bill.

MR. LUTTRELL (Devonshire, Tavistock): To ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that on 5th April last a deer turned out of a cart to be hunted by the Berks and Bucks Staghounds fell exhausted after a long run, and was so severely bitten by the hounds that it had to be destroyed; that on 7th April a deer being hunted by the same pack, on attempting to leap a spiked iron fence at Reading, was impaled upon the spikes, and having hung in this position for about half-an-hour was lifted down in a disembowelled condition and then destroyed; and whether, in view of these incidents and of public opinion, he will give facilities for the passing of the Spurious Sports Bill.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I have no information as to the painful incidents mentioned by my hon. friend, and I cannot at present add anything to the Answer which I gave to a Question of my hon. friend the Member for Peterborough on 14th March.†

Obsolete War Ships.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what it cost to build the first-class battleship "Sans Pareil," the third-class battleship "Conqueror," and the third-class armoured cruiser "Undaunted;" whether the above-named vessels only realised the sum of £57,500 by public auction at Chatham Dockyard on 9th April; and whether he can inform the House as to the weight of iron, steel, brass, and copper of the three vessels, and also the price which would have been obtainable in the market for such as old scrap.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The total cost of the three vessels named was £1,454,093, excluding guns. The amount realised at the sale on the 9th April was £57,800. The weights of the iron, steel, brass and copper cannot be given with any degree of accuracy, and the scrap value depends entirely upon the state of the metal market at the time of sale.

MR. JENKINS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the whole of the component parts of the ship are weighed when the ship is under construction?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: That may be so.

MR. JENKINS: Is it not a fact that the total weight of the ship can be easily obtained from the Dockyard record after completion?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I am informed that the total weight cannot be given with approximation to accuracy.

Progress of Ship Construction.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what are the anticipated dates of completion of the three armoured vessels of the "Defence" class laid down in February, 1905; and whether the "Defence," laid down 22nd February, 1905, is yet launched.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The date for completion of "Minotaur" and "Shannon" is 31st March, 1908. The launch of the "Defence" is fixed for 27th April, 1907, and the date for completion is December, 1908.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): Can the right hon. Gentleman point to any similar delay in the case of Germany?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I must ask for notice of that Question.

MR. BELLAIRS asked if an earlier date was not fixed in the Cawdor Memorandum for the completion of the ships?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: That can be aswered by reference to the Memorandum itself.

Naval Strength.

*MR. NUTTALL (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the completion of the large and powerful fleet of nine battleships and the ten armoured cruisers in 1909, at an estimated cost of £29,000,000, will not place the Navy far beyond the three-Power standard which we already possess; and whether, in view of the fact that neither France nor Germany had laid down a single ship of the "Dreadnought" type in 1906, the Government will consider the desirability of deferring the commencement of the three additional ships of that type and other ships proposed in this year's programme until next year.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It would be premature to make any statement in regard to the shipbuilding programme until the discussion on Vote 8.

Cavalry and Guards Probationers.

*CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what proportion of the probationers in the cavalry and Guards who lately went up for their examination passed; and whether probationers are likely to continue.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): No cavalry probationers have yet been examined; the first examination will be in December next. Twenty-one Guards (including household cavalry) probationers were examined in December, 1906, and fourteen passed. The probationary scheme is only a temporary measure and will be discontinued as soon as the exigencies of the service permit.

CAPTAIN FABER: Would it not be a good thing if the colonel commanding were given the right to say whether probationers should have a Commission?

MR. HALDANE: I think the present system much better.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): Then why change it?

MR. HALDANE was understood to reply that he only proposed to change the probationary system.

Army Economies.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the expected economies in the cost of the Army are produced solely by the reduction of personnel; and, if not, whether they are produced in part by reduction of war stores and ammunition.

Mr. HALDANE: Reductions of men admit of reduction in practice ammunition and some kinds of stores. The completion of the re-armament of the Horse and Field Artillery produces a material saving in 1907–8 as compared with 1906-7; and there are other cases in which the completion of requirements leads to reduced expenditure. The hon. Member may rest assured that the economies to which he refers are not being effected by reducing anything which is necessary for the fighting efficiency of the Army.

War Stores and Ammunition.

Mr. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the quantity of war stores and ammunition now in stock and immediately available is greater or less than the quantity stated by the Mowatt Committee to be the minimum consistent with national safety.

Mr. HALDANE: The reserves of war stores and ammunition in stock and available are in accordance with the recommendations of the Mowatt Committee.

Woolwich Arsenal.

Mr. BARNES (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there are a number of workmen at present only partially employed at Woolwich, and therefore only earning but part of the amount of wages which they had been accustomed to earn when fully employed; and, if so, will he make provision so that they may leave the service without forfeiture of the bonus to which they would be entitled if discharged.

Mr. HALDANE: The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. As regards the last part of the Question, men who are employed in shops where reductions will be necessary may apply to be discharged, and if, consistently with the public interest, such application can be granted, will be allowed to go and to receive such bonus as their service entitles them to.

Comilla Riots.

Mr. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the recent disturbances at Comilla, where a number of Mahomedans entered the bazaar crying that the Nawab of Dacca had ordered them to beat the Hindus and raze the shop of one Gogiram Pal to the ground, and, further, that in general Hindu shops were entered, the occupants assaulted, goods trampled on, and common robbery committed; and whether steps will be taken to institute a public inquiry with a view to recompense being made by the Nawab to the assaulted and robbed.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Hindus at Comilla have lodged complaints at the inaction of the police in the recent riots, in not preventing the looting of shops; and whether, seeing that rioting or disturbance between Mahomedans and Hindus was of rare occurrence prior to the partition of Bengal, steps will be taken to prevent incitement to disorder by the Nawab of Dacca and those responsible for pro-partition demonstrations.

I beg further to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that serious charges have been made against the district magistrate and the district superintendent of police at Comilla, in that the former justified the recent disturbances as the result of seditious speeches made by speakers from Calcutta, and the latter, in that when informed whilst at his club that a golmal was in progress at the bazaar, did not consider the matter worth his special attention on the spot; and whether, seeing that subsequently the Commissioner telegraphed for reinforcements and 125 military police, and the assistant inspector-general left Dacca and Silchar to quell the disturbance, and in view of the fact that Hindus were beaten, goods destroyed, and robbery committed, he will give instructions for a public inquiry into the whole matter.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. John Morley, Montrose Burghs): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer his three Questions on this subject together. The local Government have submitted a detailed report on the disturbances at Comilla, and have called for further reports and explanations on some points, pending the receipt of which a final expression of opinion must be reserved. Meanwhile precautions have been taken against a recurrence of the disorders, and all complaints made by individuals are under investigation or settlement in the courts of law. I do not think any action on my part is necessary at present.

MR. O'GRADY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that one of the men has already suffered imprisonment?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Yes, Sir.

Punjab Land Alienation Bill.

MR. O'GRADY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the all-Punjab demonstration held at Lahore to protest against the Punjab Land Alienation Bill, now passed into law; whether, as a principal result of the Act, the powers of the collector as chief executive and revenue officer of the district have been largely extended, placing the summary jurisdiction of such officer above the reach of the civil court; whether he is aware that religious and charitable gifts and alienations come under the veto of such officer, who alone can determine the bona fides of such gifts; and whether, having regard to the effect the Act will have upon that class known as the zemindars, reducing their status to that of moneylender or usurer, steps will be taken to bring the matter before the attention of the Punjab Legislative Council with a view to mitigating grievances arising from the Act.

MR. MORLEY: There appears to be some misconception in the matter. The Punjab Land Alienation Act, which placed restrictions on the alienation of land from the agricultural to the non-agricultural classes, and empowered the district revenue officers to veto transfers made in contravention of the law, has been in operation since 1900. It is reported to have worked satisfactorily, and to be popular with the agricultural classes. The Bill to which the hon. Member presumably refers is confined to amending the Act in certain particulars, and does not affect its main principles, though it will deprive the so-called "statutory agriculturist" of the power to purchase land from the agricultural classes. The "statutory agriculturist" is, I understand, an artificial creation of the law, and may be, and often is, a person who does not belong to the agricultural classes. When the proceedings of the Legislative Council come before me, I will carefully consider the memorials which have reached me objecting to its provisions.

British East Africa Police.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the total number of the police force enrolled in the British East Africa Protectorate, excluding the additional force of twenty white men ordered to be raised on the 18th March; and what are the numbers respectively of white members, excluding the above-mentioned additional men, and native members of the force.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): According to the latest returns the police force of the East Africa Protectorate consists of thirty-five white officers, and about 2,000 native officers and men.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the regulations for the enrolment of natives in the police force of the British East Africa Protectorate; whether untrained and uneducated natives are now serving; whether such natives are the custodians of the public peace, with power to arrest white men and women; whether the Secretary of State is aware that the existing condition of the police force, in regard to the selection of the native members of that force, gives rise to apprehension and dissatisfaction amongst the white population; and whether he will take steps to secure that further and better regulations shall be enforced in that respect, in order to secure due protection of white men and white women in the territory.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Regulations to which the hon. Member refers will be found in the Police Ordinance of the Protectorate, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. The rank and file of the force consists partly of Indians and Swahilis who are employed in the more settled parts, and partly of natives who are chiefly employed at the outlying stations. No doubt they are mostly uneducated, and, when they first join the force, untrained. The powers of the police to arrest persons are in general the same as those entrusted to the police of British India under Sections 54–67 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Complaints as to the constitution of the police force have been received, but they have been of a general character and have not alleged specific misconduct. The Secretary of State considers that the establishment of a small white police force, which had been decided upon before the recent incident at Nairobi, will remove all reasonable grounds for complaint.

*MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): Have the Administration in East Africa any power to deport persons found guilty of such conduct as may endanger the peace of the country?

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot say precisely what powers of deportation are possessed by the Government of British East Africa.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: Have any steps been taken to investigate the complaints already received?

MR. CHURCHILL: I am not aware whether any special steps have been taken. We are always receiving very full Reports, and during the last three months we have had the advantage of the presence in this country of the Commissioner of that district and have had the opportunity of discussing many matters with him at the Colonial Office.

Population of East Africa Protectorate.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the present total population of the East Africa Protectorate, and of this population how many are white and how many are black or coloured; how many soldiers there are in the Protectorate; and how many of these are white men.

MR. CHURCHILL: The native population of the East Africa Protectorate is roughly estimated at four millions; the white population according to the latest return numbered 1,813, including 264 Government officials. There are no white troops in the Protectorate except the Volunteer Reserve numbering 160. The number of native troops serving there, i.e., the 3rd and part of the 1st Battalion of the King's African Rifles, is about 1,200 with thirty white officers.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: In view of the figures given in the Answer, will steps be taken to increase the white force? Will the hon. Gentleman consider the possibility of getting a larger grant for the purpose?

MR. CHURCHILL: We are doing everything possible to reduce the expenditure.

Macedonian Budget.

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Estimates for the financial year, March, 1907, to March, 1908, have yet been framed and submitted to the Financial Commission in Macedonia; if not, when are they expected; whether he can state the amount of the contemplated deficit, as well as the amounts entered for civil and military expenditure respectively; and whether it is proposed to include the expenditure in connection with the reorganisation and strengthening of the Third Army Corps in the amount to be charged to the Macedonian Budget in respect of military expenditure.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The Estimates for the Macedonian Budget for the current financial year have been submitted to the Sublime Porte by the Financial Commission. The estimated deficit is £789,290. The estimated expenditure for civil administration is £839,801, and for military expenditure £1,352,894. His Majesty's Government are not aware of the particular items of which the latter portion of the Budget is composed. The total increase in it is £8,203.

Deaths by Violence in Macedonia.

MR. LYNCH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state the number of deaths due to violence which occurred in the three vilayets of Macedonia for the period from the 1st October, 1906, to the end of March, 1907.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The particulars of violent deaths in Macedonia for the month of March have not yet been received. The total number of deaths from the 1st October till the end of February is 338. The majority of the cases were due to the operations of bands of rival nationalities, but the deaths in encounters between troops and bands are also included.

Khartoum Lands and Schools.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the case of an official appropriation of land at Khartoum, the Governor, Stanton Bey, has informed the natives concerned that the price paid to them is simple backsheesh, given at the pleasure of the Government.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information on the subject. If the hon. Member will supply me with particulars of what appropriation of land is referred to, I will inquire what the circumstances and conditions of the appropriation were.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the natives at Khartoum have requested the Government to establish schools for girls, and have been referred to the Protestant schools controlled by missionary organisations, where the children are taught solely on Christian lines.

I beg further to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Soudan Government has appropriated for public purposes 1,800 feddans of land north of Khartoum, at the confluence of the Blue and White Niles, and has paid for it, not at the market rate, but at prices fixed by the officials at their pleasure; and whether at Khartoum North (Halfayah) the Government has forcibly appropriated land from native owners at £2 per feddan and has sold it for prices of £15 or more per feddan to the Model Farming Association.

I also wish to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, since the conquest of the Soudan, the administration has confiscated the lands and property formerly, and in large part before the time of the Mahdi, owned by the Wakf—, that is to say, the Moslem ecclesiastical organisation which received bequests and gifts from Moslems for religious or charitable purposes; and, if so, whether the property thus confiscated could not be devoted to purposes of education.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer to these Questions is that I have no information, but will make inquiry. With regard to female education, I have to refer the hon. Member to Chapter 42 of Lord Cromer's Report for 1906.

Siamese Cessions to France.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the King of Siam has recently ceded to France the three fertile and populous provinces of Battongbang, Siem-Reap, and Sisophon; and, if so, what compensation Siam obtained, and if he can state what effect, if any, the transaction will have on British interests in the Far East.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I must ask the hon. Member to wait till the terms of the treaty are made public before I can answer questions about it.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Is it a fact there has been a treaty?

SIR EDWARD GREY: Yes, there has been a treaty between France and Siam, but I must wait for the parties concerned to make it public before I can say anything on it.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: But how about our interests in Siam?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I may refer the hon. and gallant Member to the Agreement of 1904, between the late Government and France, which clearly defined the interests of the two countries in Siam.

Hamburg Strike.

MR. JAMES PARKER (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, since the 4th April, any further destitute British subjects have applied to the British Consul at Hamburg for assistance; whether they have been told, as was the case about three weeks ago, to go to the harbour at Hamburg where there was plenty of work; and whether the Foreign Office is prepared to give instructions to British Consuls to cease recommending destitute British workmen to act the part of blacklegs in foreign ports.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I am not aware that since April 4th any further destitute British subjects have applied to the British Consulate General at Hamburg for assistance. His Majesty's Consular officers are only authorised to repatriate destitute British subjects at the public expense when no other means of relieving their destitution can be discovered. I may add that His Majesty's Consul General at Hamburg has been most careful not to interfere in any way in the present labour dispute in that city.

Honduras Police.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under the new Alien Law of the Republic of Honduras, British subjects who may be regarded by the laws of Honduras as domiciled there are liable to be called on to serve as armed police in the event of the invasion of Honduras by any hostile force; and whether His Majesty's Government have assented to this proposition.

Sir EDWARD GREY: Article 44 of the new Alien Law exempts foreigners from military service, but states that domiciled foreigners are obliged to serve as armed police, for the security of their property and the maintenance of order in the town where they are residing. The full text of the Law will be found in Parliamentary Paper, Miscellaneous, No. 1 of 1907. This is merely a measure for the preservation of domestic law and order, and in view of the exemption of foreigners from military service could not be applied to resist invasion by a hostile force.

Sir GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): May I ask if British subjects can only be employed in this way in the case of special trouble or riot?

Sir EDWARD GREY: I have given the actual words. There can be no doubt as to their meaning.

Persia—The Tufangchari Tax.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the imposition in the Yezd district of the tax known as tufangchari is in accordance with the Anglo-Persian Convention of 9th February, 1903; and, if, not, whether any efforts, and what efforts, are being made to put a stop to its imposition.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I have no information as to the imposition of the special tax in question. But the levy of illegal taxes in the Yezd district in general has been the subject of representations to the Persian Government on the part of His Majesty's Legation at Tehran.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to ascertain if this tax is being imposed, and, if it is, make representations on the subject?

Sir EDWARD GREY: Representations have already been made in March last.

Opium Production in China.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what steps have been taken by the Government of China to reduce the area of land now cultivated in China for the production of opium.

Sir EDWARD GREY: By Article 1 of the Regulations issued under the Imperial Decree of September 20th, 1906, no new ground can be placed under poppy cultivation, and that already under poppy cultivation must be reduced by one-tenth at least every year. If the regulation is evaded, the ground can be confiscated. A fresh decree was issued on 7th February last, with the object of securing greater uniformity in carrying out the existing regulations, and it is understood that it will be followed by further regulations prescribing the conditions under which the gradual diminution of cultivation is to be effected. I cannot yet say how far these decrees have been made effective.

MR. LYNCH: Have the Government at their dispoaal any machinery for ascertaining what the Chinese Government are really doing?

SIR EDWARD GREY: Yes, Sir; there are consular reports on the subject.

MR. LYNCH: I am informed that no opportunity is afforded of getting information.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Have the Indian Government made any corresponding regulations for the reduction of the growth of opium?

Government Paint Factories.

MR. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the factory and workshop regulations made by him on the 21st January last in respect of dangerous and unhealthy industries, which do not apply to factories and workshops in which paints and colours are manufactured, not for sale, but solely for use in the business of the occupier, apply to the Royal Dockyards; and, if not, whether he will explain why this is so, and arrange that all Government workshops shall be included, and the workmen so employed receive the benefit of these regulations which materially affect their lives and health.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The regulations do not apply to the Royal Dockyards. Places in which the manufacture of paints is carried on only as ancillary to the main business of the factory were not included in the rules because the same danger to the workers is not found to exist in those places as in places where the manufacture is carried on for sale as the business of the factory. Nearly all the cases of plumbism reported from dockyards occur to men engaged in using the mixed paints, or in scraping off old paint in confined spaces such as the double bottom of ships, and to these processes the paint and colour regulations do not apply. Any danger, however, that may be caused to the workers employed in the dockyards in the making of paints by the inhalation of poisonous dust can be dealt with adequately by ordinary administrative action under Section 74 of the Factory Act, and such action will be taken wherever necessary.

Alcester Vaccination Case.

MR. LUPTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that on the 19th day of March, 1907, A. H. Moore, of Alcester, Shaftesbury, applied for a vaccination exemption certificate at the Shaftesbury petty sessions, two magistrates only sitting, Mr. H. A. Dunstan, chairman, and Mr. L. Fox Pitt, and that Mr. Dunstan refused to sign the exemption certificate; and if he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have communicated with the justices who adjudicated in this case. They inform me that the case was carefully considered, and that the applicant did not satisfy both of them that he had a conscientious belief that vaccination would be prejudicial to the child in question. As I have often stated before, I have no authority to interfere with the discretion of the magistrates in this matter.

MR. LUPTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the new Vaccination Bill will be brought in?

MR. GLADSTONE: That Question should be addressed to the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): Is it necessary in the case of ordinary justices that two shall adjudicate where a stipendiary magistate sits alone?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, that is so.

Slate Quarry Fatalities.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that, according to the Report on Mines and Quarries for 1905, the fatalities among the inside workers in mines were 1·519 per 1000, whilst among inside workers in slate quarries it was no less than 2·39; and what steps, if any, have been taken in face of the statement on Mines and Quarries (1905), page 95, that an unsatisfactory feature of Table 82 is the high death rate among the inside workers in slate quarries.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am aware of the figures to which the hon. Member calls my attention and which are those published in the annual statistics issued by my Department. The figures however for 1906, not yet issued, will show a very great decrease in the death rate for the Carnarvonshire slate quarries, only one fatal accident having occurred at those quarries during the year. The conditions existing at these quarries are receiving special attention from the inspectors, and I have called for a further Report from them on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAM JONES (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): In view of the great danger in the working of metalliferous mines, will evidence as to them be received before the Mines Commission?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I think it will be open to the Commission to take such evidence, but I am not sure.

Crime in York.

Mr. MOONEY (Newry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that during the year 1905 there were 295 indictable crimes known to the police to have been committed in the county borough of York, and whether, in connection with these crimes, only 171 persons were apprehended; whether he can state if this class of crime is diminishing in this district; whether he can state the cause of the failure of the police to secure these offenders; and whether he intends to take any steps to enable the police to bring to trial a larger percentage of the offenders.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The figures are correctly quoted, but the great majority of the so-called "crimes" are small larcenies disposed of summarily by the justices. There are many cases where the owner of the stolen property declines to prosecute, and many cases where several offences are committed by the same person; so that, if the police force is efficient and the returns are correctly made, the number of persons prosecuted must always be considerably less than the number of offences committed. In York, the proportion is about the same as in England and Wales generally. There is no marked increase or decrease of crime in York.

Agrarian Crime in Yorkshire.

Mr. MOONEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that during the year 1905 there were fifty-three cases of malicious injury to property, including twenty-three cases of arson and four cases of killing and maiming of cattle, known to the police in the county of Yorkshire; if he can state when the figures for the year 1906 will be available, or if he can now state whether there is any diminution of this class of crime in this county.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The figures stated are substantially accurate. The figures for 1906 are not yet available, so I cannot say whether they show any diminution.

Mr. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): May I ask whether the proportion of crime to population in Yorkshire is not one which the Government would gladly see attained or even approached in the county represented by the hon. Member who put this Question?

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): The proportion is much smaller.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the proportion of crime to population in Ireland is far less than in England?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes, I believe that is so. But we are always glad to see a diminution.

Captain CRAIG (Down, E.): Is it not the fact that the Returns show that in Ireland for many crimes committed people are not brought to justice?

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND: And is it not the fact that much of the crime in Ireland is due to the circulation of bad whisky which some people here know about?

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): The fox run to earth!

Death Certificates in the Shardlow Union.

MR. SUMMERBELL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the charge (3s. 7d.) made for death certificates by the relieving officer and collector of the Shardlow Union; and, if so, whether it is his intention to take any action, having for its object the fixing of a smaller charge for such certificates.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): One of the relieving officers of the Shardlow Union is also registrar of births and deaths, and it is in the latter capacity that he has issued certificates of death when required. I understand that in no case has he charged a higher fee than that authorised. The charges in connection with certificates of death are statutory, and I am not empowered to alter them.

Poor Law—Removal of Aged Sick.

MR. SUMMERBELL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that evidence was given at the inquest, held at Poplar on 9th April, on a poor woman named Baker, aged eighty-one, who was ordered by the parish doctor to be removed to the sick asylum, to the effect that this removal was effected by two officers or servants of the guardians of the Stepney union who were both drunk; that the witness's daughter protested against the removal of her mother by men in such a condition; that the men dropped the old woman on the pavement; that when they arrived at the asylum the ambulance was kept twenty minutes before the sick woman could be taken out, as the driver of the ambulance could not find the key; will he say whether the medical officer or the relieving officer is responsible for the safe and proper removal of sick persons for indoor relief; and, if so, whether he will recommend to the Stepney guardians that when aged people in grave sickness are removed from their own homes the guardians should send a doctor or nurse to supervise the removal.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The case to which my hon. friend refers is, I think, that of a woman named Lewis. I have seen the depositions taken at the inquest in that case, which show that the facts are substantially as stated by him. I understand that the guardians have taken some action in this matter, but I am making further investigations with regard to it. As regards the point referred to in the last part of the Question, the clerk to the guardians informs me that in cases of removal to the infirmary or sick asylum, where no female friend or relative can accompany the patient the relieving officer and the medical officer are empowered to engage the services of a female attendant to be present at the removal. In this instance two daughters accompanied the patient.

Lodgers' Letters.

MR. BRAMSDON: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will explain why letters addressed to persons who are lodgers cannot be readdressed at the post office; and whether, having regard to the boon that the privilege of readdressing letters at the post office has conferred on householders, he will consider whether he can extend the privilege to all classes.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I have recently given very careful consideration to the point which the hon. Member raises, but I regret that I do not see my way to extending the scope of official redirection. The work of redirection is already a considerable hindrance to the ordinary work of the postmen; and if it were extended to lodgers' letters serious delay and inconvenience would be caused. There is not the same need for official redirection in the case of lodgers as in the case of householders. In any case in which good grounds are shown for requiring the assistance of the post office in the matter, official redirection is, as far as practicable, undertaken.

Trams and Mail Carriage.

MR. SUMMERBELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he can state the tramway undertakings in this country with which the Post Office Department have an arrangement as to the carrying of letters or postal employees; and, if so, the payments made in each case for such service.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: Payments are made to tramway undertakings for the conveyance of mails or Post Office employees in a large number of cases. It would be impossible to give the detailed information for which the hon. Member asks within the limits of an Answer to a Question.

Hawkhurst Postman's Grievance.

Mr. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether Rule 116 (iii.), contained in the book of rules for rural postmen and auxiliaries, is still in force; if so, why S. Smith, auxiliary town postman at Hawkhurst, Kent, has been deprived of his fixed Sunday allowance of 3s. 3d. during temporary absence from duty owing to an infectious disease; and, if the said rule has been altered or repealed, why the rural postal officials have not been informed of such alteration or repeal.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: The rule is still in force, and Smith's wages were paid in full, but a distinction, which I think unsound, was made between wages and payment for Sunday duty. I have now directed payment to be made in full.

New Zealand Mails.

Mr. FELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if any progress has been made in re-arranging the San Francisco mail service to New Zealand; and if he can hold out any prospect of its being shortly re-established.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: So far as I am aware the situation remains unaltered. I am not in a position to express any opinion as to the prospects of the re-establishment of the service, which is entirely outside my control.

Scottish Whaling Stations.

Mr. STARKEY (Nottinghamshire, Newark): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland how many whaling stations or factories at present exist in Scotland; and how many of them are owned or occupied by foreigners.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): There are five whaling stations in Scotland. Of these, four are owned by foreigners and one by a British firm.

Constable O'Halloran, Royal Irish Constabulary.

Mr. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Constable O'Halloran, who was disabled for life by a gunshot wound received on the night of 9th October last while affording police protection to Colonel Lopdell, near Athenry, was in receipt of pay of £53 a year, and that the pension to which he is entitled now on retiring from the Royal Irish Constabulary is only £24 a year; and seeing, that this constable was on the list for early promotion to the rank of sergeant, whether any, and, if so, what, additional pension will be paid to him by reason of his having been maimed in the discharge of his duty.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): Constable O'Halloran was seriously injured by a gunshot on the occasion mentioned, and has since been under medical treatment. The question whether he is permanently incapacitated for service has not yet been determined. The constable's present pay is £67 per annum. His ordinary pension would amount to £24 a year, but if it should be certified that he is permanently incapacitated by reason of injuries received while on duty, there is power to award him a pension not exceeding his annual pay. Constable O'Halloran has lodged a claim against the county council for compensation in respect of the malicious injury inflicted upon him, and if he should be granted compensation the fact would be taken into account in fixing the amount of pension. The constable's case will receive full consideration.

Loughrea Compensation Appeals at Galway Assizes.

*Captain FABER (Hampshire, Andover): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at the late assizes at Galway, Lord Justice Holmes gave compensation for malicious injuries in the district of Loughrea to the amount of £67 19s. 6d. in seven cases; that all these cases were appealed against from quarter sessions by the county council; and that Lord Justice Holmes stated that the taking of these appeals was a scandalous waste of public money; and, if so, will the matter be brought under the notice of the Local Government Board.

MR. BIRRELL: At the recent Galway Assizes the Loughrea District Council appealed, in the exercise of their statutory right, against five awards of compensation for malicious injury. In one case the appeal was successful, and in the remaining four cases the award was confirmed with costs, the total amount of compensation in these cases being £53 and the costs £22. According to a newspaper report of the proceedings which has been brought to my notice, Lord Justice Holmes made a remark to the effect stated in the Question. The payments made by the council in these cases will come before the Local Government Board's auditor in due course.

Intimidation in Roscommon.

*CAPTAIN FABER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at Roscommon quarter sessions in a case where a policeman was processed for the value of a drum which was damaged in a conflict with the police in an attempt to intimidate one B. O'Brien, the holder of a grass farm; is he aware that the judge stated that intimidation had taken place and dismissed the process, but afterwards reversed this decision and gave compensation for the drum; and will he say if there have been further attempts to intimidate graziers in Roscommon since this decision, and have any of the persons attacked surrendered their property.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Before that Question is answered, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that this is canvassing or censuring the conduct of a judge. The Question alleges that the judge said that in consequence of intimidation that he would dismiss the process and that he afterwards reversed that decision, and the Question goes on to ask whether in consequence of that action of the judge attempts at intimidation had increased. Is that not canvassing and censuring the conduct of a judge?

*MR. SPEAKER: If the implication were as the hon. Member suggests it would be clearly out of order, but it does not appear to me, with such knowledge of the facts as the Question gives me that that implication must necessarily be made. The suggestion is that the judge changed his mind; I do not suppose that is any imputation upon him.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: The Question asks whether since that action of changing his mind the attempts have increased.

*MR. SPEAKER: The words "since that decision," simply refer to a point of time.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman say if, as a matter of fact, this judge is not a Unionist gentleman appointed by the Unionist Government?

*CAPTAIN FABER: The last thing I should wish to do is to canvass the conduct of any judge in the United Kingdom.

MR. BIRRELL: I am informed that in the case referred to, which was heard on 27th March, the County Court Judge gave a decree against a constable for damaging a drum. The constable, however, has lodged an appeal, and it would therefore be undesirable to enter into the details of the case. An intimidatory demonstration was attempted at Elphin on 31st March, the particulars of which are stated in my reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh on 10th April.† I am not aware of any other recent similar case in Roscommon. The police authorities have heard that some graziers in the district have announced their intention of surrendering their farms, but have no information that any surrender has actually taken place.

Irish University Bill.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the proposals of His Majesty's Government for dealing with Irish university education are those outlined by Mr. Bryce in his speech of the 25th January last.

MR. BIRRELL: The proposals of His Majesty's Government will proceed upon the lines indicated by Mr. Bryce, subject it may be, as indeed he intimated, to modifications if found necessary.

† See (4) Debates, clxxii., 288.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state when it is his intention to place before Parliament the proposals of His Majesty's Government with reference to Irish university education.

MR. BIRRELL: I am not yet in a position to name a date.

Drumsna Evicted Tenant.

MR. THOMAS F. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Owen Scollan, Lismoyle, Drumsna, an evicted tenant on the Albemarle estate in county Leitrim; and if an inspector will investigate same.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received no application from the person named in the Question.

Cattan Evicted Tenant.

MR. THOMAS F. SMYTH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners will have Francis McNally, an evicted tenant, reinstated in his farm at Cattan, on the White estate, in county Leitrim, as negotiations are going on at present for the sale of this estate; and, in the event of his not being permitted to sign the purchase agreement, if he will get compensation, so that he might be able to procure a farm elsewhere.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have considered McNally's application, but have not been able to arrange for his reinstatement. The farm from which he was evicted is held by another tenant. McNally's name has been noted as that of a person suitable to work land, and his claim will be considered by the Commissioners in the event of their having land to dispose of in the district.

Corduff and Finnalaughta Evicted Tenants.

MR. THOMAS F. SMYTH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners will have Bernard Bohan, Corduff, and Peter Cannon, Finnalaughta, evicted tenants on the estate of the late Colonel Forbes, in county Leitrim, restored to their former holdings, and, as negotiations are going on for the sale of this estate, if the Estates Commissioners will see that these evicted tenants get the privilege of signing the purchase agreements, and not the men who are in possession of the farms at present.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Bernard Bohan, but not from Peter Cannon. Bohan is in occupation of a holding of sixteen acres, being part of the holding from which his father was evicted. The remainder of the evicted holding is in the occupation of another tenant who is not prepared to surrender it. In the circumstances the Commissioners have decided to take no action in the matter.

Rates for Irish Education.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what was the total sum raised by local rates during 1906–7 for the purpose of elementary education in Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: No local education rate is raised in Ireland. The expenses of school attendance committees, however, fall upon the rates; and the cost of repairing national schools not vested in the Commissioners of National Education is borne by the localities, as well as a portion of the cost of building such schools.

Catholics and Irish Government Appointment.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that, soon after the appointment of Mr. Henry Williams as Secretary to the Board of Works, Dublin, a letter was received from the Civil Service Commissioners and opened in the Registry to the effect that the Civil Service Commissioners made no inquiry into the religion of clerks appointed after open competition to Government Departments, and considering that this was not a circular letter, and must have been a reply to a special request made by the Board of Works to have no Roman Catholics appointed to the office, will he cause inquiry to be made from the Board of Works who was responsible for approaching the Civil Service Commissioners on this matter; and, in view of the general belief in the department that it was the Secretary who was guilty of this action, unprecedented in the history of the Civil Service, will he have all the papers in connection with this matter laid before the House of Commons at an early date.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury): If the hon. Member will supply me with the evidence on which he has decided to make a charge of this character, I will have it carefully investigated.

STANDING COMMITTEES—EFFECT OF NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) asked the Speaker what would be the position of the two Standing Committees in view of the changes that would be made by the new rules of procedure.

*MR. SPEAKER: The conclusion to which I have come is that there is nothing in the new Standing Orders to abrogate the position of the two Standing Committees on Law and Trade; they will remain and continue to exercise the functions they have hitherto exercised and will dispose of the Bills committed to them, until such time, if any, as the House may take other action or until they have completed their work. If the House chooses to transfer the series of Bills which has been committed to the two Committees, to the new Committees to be appointed, that is a matter for the House to decide; but until that decision is come to it is the duty of the two Committees to continue and to dispose of the work committed to them by the House.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) asked if the House was to understand that, until the House otherwise ordered, there would be four Standing Committees in addition to the existing two.

*MR. SPEAKER: There cannot be six Committees; the House has not provided for them. The House has provided for four, and the two existing Committees will go on with their work until their labours are concluded, unless the House takes other steps and sets up two new Committees in lieu of them.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) inquired whether private Members would continue to retain the precedence on both the existing Grand Committees which they now possessed.

*MR. SPEAKER: I take it that the rules which regulate the working of the Grand Committees will continue to apply to them so long as these Grand Committees are in force.

HOME WORK BILL.

"To provide for the better regulation of Home industries," presented by Mr. Barnes; supported by Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. Alexander Wilkie, Mr. Cameron Corbett, Mr. Cleland, Mr. Rainy, Mr. Charles Duncan, Mr. Summerbell, Mr. James Parker, and Mr. Steadman; to be read a second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 158.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [15th April] to Question [20th March], as amended,—"(1) When a Bill has been a second time it shall stand committed to one of the Standing Committees, unless the House, on Motion to be decided without Amendment or debate, otherwise order, and such a Motion shall not require notice, must be made immediately after the Bill is read a second time, may be made by any Member, and may, though opposed, be decided after the expiration of the time for opposed business. But this Order shall not apply to—(a) Bills for imposing taxes, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills; or (b) Bills for confirming Provisional Orders. (2) The House may, on Motion made by the Member in charge of a Bill, commit the Bill to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions, and to a Committee of the whole House in respect of other provisions. If such a Motion is opposed, the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes and from the Member who opposes the Motion, shall without further debate put the Question thereon."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words,—'(c) Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom. (d) Bills to give effect to treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements. (e) Bills to sanction the cession of any territory forming part of the dominions of the Crown.'"—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) said he wished to draw attention to the extreme importance of excepting from the operation of the Rule Bills which affected treaties, conventions, or other international arrangements. This was a serious question for hon. Members to consider, as they would realise when they remembered what occurred not so very long ago in connection with the New Hebrides, and what might occur again if the Prime Minister's proposals were carried without Amendment. Obviously a Convention which affected not only this country but France and our Australasian Colonies as well as the native and white populations of the New Hebrides, ought to have been fully discussed in the House itself. He would not, however, labour that point which had been so well put by the right hon. Member for the Hallam Division of Sheffield on the previous night, but he would appeal to hon. Members generally to consider carefully the importance of the power which they were being asked to part with. Then again there was the question of the cession of territory. Surely it would be a great innovation for the House to allow Bills of that nature to be removed from full discussion in the House. But he would pass from those points and deal with (c) affecting Bills to create a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom. That was indeed a very important matter, and in his opinion the right hon. Member for Hallam had not gone far enough in wording his Amendment. There had been statements both in and out of Parliament with regard to the proposed legislation for Ireland, and although he took it that the intention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Hallam Division was to prevent the possibility of any question regarding Home Rule or any measure extending self-government in Ireland being removed from discussion on the floor of the House, he feared that after the contradictory statements made by various Ministers as to the intentions of the Government it would be necessary to widen the Amendment, so as to make sure that when the Bill was introduced—and he sincerely hoped it never would be—it would not be open for Ministers to claim that it was not really a measure which created a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom. What they had to fear was that a Bill might possibly be sent upstairs which, although professing not to be a Bill of the nature described in the clause, was really intended to lead up to a separate legislature for one portion of the United Kingdom, and he took it that the intention of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment was to prevent the possibility of such a Bill being sent upstairs. To make it clearer, however, he intended to propose, as an Amendment to that Amendment, to add after the word "kingdom" the words "or Bills which their promoters declare are intended to lead up to a subordinate legislature in any part of the United Kingdom." Those words would secure them against such legislation being relegated to a certain number of gentlemen upstairs. Although it was quite possible for the great majority now in power to defeat the proposal there ought to be a sense of fairness which would recognise that there was in the House a minority which really and sincerely feared the introduction of legislation of this kind, believing it would be seriously detrimental to the prosperity of their country, and feeling the necessity for the freest possible debate on all stages in the House itself. Had the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University been accepted in the spirit in which it was brought forward his own Amendment would not have been so necessary, as on the Report stage it would have been possible fully to discuss vital points raised in Committee; but as he understood the Prime Minister's Amendment it did not go so far as was promised. The fact was they had been betrayed, and consequently a safeguard had been taken away from them. In the past the House had shown itself most jealous in protecting the interests of minorities. There was no minority in that House so small and yet so excellently representative as the Irish Unionist Party, and it was in their interest that he moved his Amendment. He hoped that hon. Members' sense of fairness would incline them to give it due consideration, and to remove from the operation of the proposed Rule a Bill to which the Unionist Members looked forward with horror, and which if it were ever introduced ought to be subjected to full analytical criticism and debate in the House itself. He begged to move.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) seconded the Amendment. While agreeing with the first part of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Hallam Division, he felt that it required amplification in the way proposed by his hon. and gallant friend, and he sincerely hoped the House would see its way to adopt the suggestion. It seemed to be the desire of the Government to stifle discussion on all important questions, but inasmuch as the introduction of any measure tending to the establishment of a separate Legislature in any part of the kingdom would be a direct revolution in the policy of the country, such a measure ought to be fully and adequately discussed on the floor of the House, so that the discussion might come out fully in the Press, and the people of the country learn what was proposed to be done by the Government at the instance of their ardent supporters below the gangway. The adoption of his hon. and gallant friend's Amendment would preclude any possibility of a Bill obviously intended to set up a separate Legislature being sent upstairs instead of receiving adequate discussion on the floor of the House.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"In line 2, after the word 'Kingdom,' to insert the words 'or Bills which the promoters declare are intended to lead up to a subordinate Legislature in any part of the United Kingdom.'"—(Captain Craig.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.) said the noble Lord and the hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to have a thorough conviction as to the contents and tendency of a measure which they had not yet seen. So far as he could he desired to calm the apprehensions, which he thought unnecessary, in the breasts of those hon. Members. There was no intention whatever of sending the measure to which the hon. Members referred upstairs. It would, from the beginning to the end of its, he hoped, fortunate and peaceful passage, be retained in the House, in the atmosphere of which hon. Gentlemen would have the infinite satisfaction of discussing it. But when they came to the insertion of general words in a Rule of this kind, especially such vague words as those proposed, he did not think any sensible Legislature would take such a course. He could only repeat that from beginning to end Bills of this kind would remain in the custody of the House, and the Government had no intention whatever of sending them upstairs.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) did not think that the Answer given by the right hon. Gentleman would be regarded as satisfactory by the mover and seconder of the Amendment. If the right hon. Gentleman had taken the trouble to follow the speeches of his own Leader, the Prime Minister, he would not be in such a state of ignorance as he now found himself. They presumed that the Prime Minister spoke with a full knowledge of the intentions of the Government, and he had left no doubt in the minds of his hearers that the Bill to be brought forward was one which would lead up to the larger measure of Home Rule. What could be the objection of the Government to stating in plain language what they meant? They were not dealing with an Order which was merely special in its character. They were altering the Standing Orders for all time, and it could be no answer to the objections raised on that side to say "You have a particular measure in your minds, and we say it is not going to be taken upstairs." What they asked was that it should be stated what measures were to be retained in the House. In the general discussion on the Prime Minister's proposal he raised a point which had never been answered, viz., what were the Government's intentions with regard to adverse decisions on Bills in Grand Committees. [Interruption.] It was of no use hon. Gentlemen interrupting him, he was in the hands of Mr. Speaker, who was quite competent to tell him if he were not in order, and the President of the Board of Education, by his interruptions, was showing that he had little regard for the time of the House. Supposing a Bill were introduced from which were carefully excluded powers which certain sections of the House desired to see included, and a combination were formed which carried against the Government a Motion that was vital to the Bill, the usual consequences would follow. What he asked the Chancellor of the Duchy was this: a Bill went upstairs, and if such a combination were formed, and the Government were defeated, what course did the Government propose to take, having regard to the amended procedure? Were they to regard the defeat upstairs in a Committee of eighty members in the same light as they would regard it in the House, or did they propose entirely to disregard the defeat upstairs and wait until the Bill came back to the House, making full use of the interval for the application of the usual arguments to hon. Gentlemen who had voted against them? They might entirely change the decision of Parliament by the very fact that they disregarded a decision upstairs, though that decision was vital to the Bill. He submitted that that was a constitutional question which the Government ought to answer.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) said the right hon. Gentleman had stated that it was not the intention of the Government to send upstairs the Bill foreshadowed in connection with the Government of Ireland. Surely the time had gone by when they could place reliance on what was the intention of the Government in the matter. He thought, in any case, that it was a very weak argument for the right hon. Gentleman to use. Certainly, after what the right hon. Gentleman had said, it was not a question of the intention of the Government, but of what the Government were likely to do. What, in this case, were the Government likely to do if they found that their intentions were not likely to be received in the spirit in which they should be received by hon. Members below the gangway? But the Bill foreshadowed for Ireland was not the only Bill which his hon. and gallant friend had in view when he moved his Amendment. There were a great many other Bills that might be brought forward in the near future leading up to the provision of a separate Legislature. He hoped the Prime Minister would answer the Amendment of his hon. and gallant friend, and give a rather fuller answer than that by the Chief Secretary.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said he would not be so discourteous as not to answer the right hon. Gentleman, who had appealed to him personally, although it was rather difficult to answer, especially after the speech which the noble Lord had just made. It was the kind of speech which he thought the noble Lord would regret when he had been a little longer in the House. The answer to the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly clear. The case which he put was a Government defeat by a combination in the Standing Committee on a point which the Government regarded as vital. Of course the Government, when the Bill came down from Committee, would take the course which all Governments took. The House would have to grapple with the situation as a whole. As to an alteration introduced by a casual combination of a very small minority compared with the whole House, the Government would tell the House, as Governments had already done, that when there was a clause put into a Bill which they regarded as vital to it, and which would impair what they considered the intention and purport and meaning of the Bill, they would take the usual course, and they would have to follow the course which the House thought best. They all remembered Mr. Gladstone's phrase, which was that—

MR. WALTER LONG: That statement was made during the progress of the Committee, and if the decision in Committee was adverse, the action which the Government would take would immediately follow.

SIR HENRY FOWLER said he thought that made the case stronger for the Government, for it then took it out of the discretion, after a final decision, of the Committee, which was not competent to decide questions on which the existence of the Government depended. It was not competent for eighty Members of the House to decide whether the Government possessed the confidence of the House of Commons. It would have been very hard on the late Government if that had been done in the past. It was rather difficult when the House was heated, but he appealed to the common sense of the House in this matter. They were told that they were practically rogues, but they were not fools, and they would act as common-sense men would do. He did not think that any Government had ever sat on those Benches which had not acted in accordance with the highest sense of what was due to the House and country when vital questions were before them.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had just made was, he thought, the answer which his right hon. friend expected to get from him. But of course the House saw what it involved in a large number of cases—the ignoring by the Government of the decisions and labours of the Committees which they had gone to such trouble to set up. If the opinion of the Committee happened to differ from the opinion of the Government, the Government would reserve to itself the right to ask the House upon Report to go into the whole question again and reverse the decision of the Committee. If the Government reserved to themselves that discretion they would not dispute the right of every Member of the House to exercise the same discretion. If the Government had the right, it was also the right of the individual Member. Accordingly what they had to contemplate was that the Report stage would be far more arduous than at present, that decisions on the Committee stage would carry far less weight than they did now, and that the House on Report would constantly have the right to undo and do over again the work which had been done in Committee. The Chancellor of the Duchy had commented with some warmth on the speech of his hon. friend behind him. He thought it was needless warmth, and when the right hon. Gentleman thought of what his hon. friend had said, he would see that it did not call for the rebuke which, as an old Member, he had administered to his hon. friend. What his noble friend said was that they could not rely on the intentions of the Government.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: The noble Lord said that reliance could not be placed on the statements of the Government.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: No, the noble Lord said that reliance could not be placed upon the intentions of the Government, and it was a correction of the right hon. Gentleman which he made on his hon. friend's behalf.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER accepted the explanation.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said that nobody would contend for one moment that the intentions of the Government at the present moment were binding upon them a couple of years hence, say; still less were they binding on any other Government. Without being offensive, he begged to recall to the House the fact that the Prime Minister himself had explained more than once the difference between an intention expressed by the Government and a pledge given by the Government. On more than one occasion they thought they had received a pledge from the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had corrected them, explaining that he had expressed an intention in the light of the Government's then knowledge and expectations as to the course of business, and he had resented pretty strongly any suggestion from the Opposition of a breach of faith. Intentions were not a very suitable basis on which to place Standing Orders. Only on Thursday last the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his intention to accept the Amendment of his right hon. friend the Member for Dublin University. That was the Prime Minister's intention, but his Amendment did not carry out that intention. From facts fresh in their memory, he submitted that his noble friend had said no more than what was obvious to any man when he stated that in making Standing Orders they could not rely on the intentions of the Government.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.) felt that there was more substance in this Amendment than the right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench had realised even in regard to the particular Bill alluded to by the Chief Secretary. It would be within the recollection of the House that the Chief Secretary had assured his hon. and gallant friend that he did not need to be under any apprehension in regard to the Irish Bill, or as to whether it was intended to lead up to Home Rule. The Amendment before them really raised the big question of the reference of contentious Bills to Grand Committees. He thought he was right in saying that when the Grand Committee system was instituted in 1882 it was not Mr. Gladstone's intention that the Committees should be used for the discussion of highly contentious measures. Mr. Gladstone, speaking of these Grand Committees, said—

> "The Committees would consider only those subjects with which the painful considerations of Party cannot be mixed up."

The Chief Secretary had stated that the particular Bill referred to would not go to a Grand Committee, but the point they wished to press was, would Bills of that character go to a Grand Committee? The Government had already refused an Amendment which would have prevented Bills of a highly contentious character going to a Grand Committee. The Prime Minister, in the statement he had made, appeared to be contemplating the possibility of the Scottish Land Bill going to one of these Committees. When the right hon. Gentleman suggested that a Bill of that character might be sent upstairs he would remind him that in 1894, when the Scottish Committee was set up, it was said that it was perfectly plain that a Crofters Bill could not be referred to such a Committee. Upon the general question he would like to quote one of the greatest Parliamentarians, the late Sir William Harcourt. In the debates on the setting up of the Scottish Committee in 1894, an Amendment was moved defining what kind of Bills should be dealt with, and Sir William Harcourt said—

> "When the noble Lord asks me whether great Parliamentary questions such as the Land Acts, Home Rule, Disestablishment, and questions of that kind, which I call of a highly political and controversial character, are proper subjects for a Committee of this character, I have to tell him that that is not the object of a Committee of this character."

He went on to say—

> "That the Committee was to be used for measures which were not of a high political character."

That view was confirmed by Sir George Trevelyan, who went even further, for he said—

> "No Bill objected to by a large minority of the House would ever be referred to that Committee."

Then Sir George Trevelyan went on to say—

> "No Government, unless composed of nothing short of lunatics, would propose to bring any contentious Bill before a Grand Committee."

He reminded the Prime Minister that several times in the course of those debates the opinion was expressed that particular Bills would not be brought before the Grand Committee, on the ground that they involved high constitutional principles. If the Government had accepted the previous Amendment there would have been no necessity to move the one under discussion; but as they had refused a general Amendment these proposals were now necessary. With regard to the possible defeat of the Government in Committee, he assumed that the Government in forming these Rules were contemplating a code of procedure not only for this Parliament but to facilitate the work of the House in the future. But what would happen? There might come a time when some other Government would sit on the benches opposite. There might be a Conservative Government in power and Scotland might be represented by a majority of Radical Members. Under those circumstances to defeat a Committee would be a matter of daily occurrence, and then the Government would become a sort of political Penelope undoing what had been done on these Committees. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe appeared to suggest that the object of these Committees was to enable a Liberal Government to pass Liberal legislation. That might be a laudable object from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but it was not a proper conception of the functions of any Committee of the House. He would again appeal to the late Sir William Harcourt, who said—

> "He would never be a Party to the breaking up of the control of the House of Commons as a whole over great questions which interested the whole country."

He went on to say—

> "To use any instrument of this kind to secure the predominance of a Party majority would be an abuse of power."

For those reasons he strongly supported the Amendment of his hon. and gallant friend.

Mr. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy) thought the Opposition might very well rest satisfied with the declaration of the Chief Secretary that it was not the intention of the Government to send Bills dealing with Ireland to any of the Committees upstairs. With regard to the question whether the Government of the day ought to regard a defeat in Committee upstairs as equivalent to a defeat downstairs he could not understand the position taken up by the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin had complained that the Government would not regard a defeat upstairs in that light.

Mr. WALTER LONG: I did not say that; I simply asked the question.

Mr. DALZIEL said the hon. Member for North-West Lanarkshire had referred to the position of a Conservative Government if there happened to be on the Scottish Committee a majority of Radical Members representing Scotland able to carry propositions upstairs which the Government would have to reverse downstairs. Did the hon. Member contend that Scottish opinion should not prevail when a Tory Government was in power? That was not the argument he used at the last general election.

Mr. MITCHELL-THOMSON said it was quite right that Scottish opinion should prevail, but that did not necessarily mean Scottish Radical opinion.

Mr. DALZIEL said the representation of Scotland had been overwhelmingly Radical for many years. It did not appear to be recognised that the Government were making a very important departure so far as the whole administration of the House was concerned. If they were simply going to regard the new Committees as the embodiment of the old ones they ought not to be wasting time discussing these new proposals. The proposals of the Government were far-reaching and struck vitally at the whole business arrangements of the House with a view to taking away all those matters of detail which could be properly threshed out upstairs, thus leaving the time of the House free for the consideration of the greater questions which might come before them. In reading quotations from speeches made many years ago it was necessary to remember that they were now living under different circumstances. The present was a more democratic House of Commons than had been previously elected, and it was pledged to deal with certain reforms. It was because it was through the medium of these Grand Committees that those great objects were to be achieved that the majority of the House would support the proposal of the Government. As to the position of the Government in relation to the decisions of Committees upstairs, if there should happen to be an Amendment carried against the Government it would depend entirely on the relative importance of the Amendment whether the Government could accept it when the Bill came downstairs. The Minister in charge might accept it so as to speed the passage of the Bill through the House. It would always be in the power of the Government to reverse or to approve the decisions of the Grand Committees. The House would retain supreme power over all the deliberations of Committees upstairs. They would have that security on the Report stage.

*SIR ARTHUR BIGNOLD (Wick Burghs) said the difficulty was in knowing what was controversial matter. In the last Parliament, when the Musical Copyright Bill was introduced, he had the honour to submit to the then Prime Minister a request asking him to "star" it on the Order Paper. The petition was signed by forty-nine out of every fifty Members to whom it was presented. The Government of the day "starred" it, but it did not pass. When the present Government adopted a Bill introduced by Mr. Agar-Robartes, the Prime Minister justified the course he had taken in "starring" it by pointing to the Musical Copyright Bill as a highly controversial measure which his predecessor had starred. When the hon. Member for the Aston Manor referred yesterday to the Scottish Small Holdings Bill as a Bill so contentious that the Government would certainly not send it upstairs, Ministers shook their heads and led the House to infer that the Bill might be relegated to Grand Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has forgotten the Amendment which is now before the House.

*SIR ARTHUR BIGNOLD said he bowed to the ruling. He trusted that the Government would see their way to accept the Amendment, and that before the discussion was concluded that evening they would give the House some intimation of what they meant by a controversial measure.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said he could not help thinking that the Government had chosen a method which was likely to lead to more controversy than was necessary in the proceedings of the House. He understood that the object of the Government in introducing this particular change in the Rules was to produce as much legislation as possible in a given time out of the Parliamentary machine. He did not find fault with that at the moment, but the objection of hon. Members on his side of the House was that the Parliamentary machine could only produce so much work in a given time. He ventured to suggest that the Government were applying the wrong remedy. The remedy was to produce less legislation, but of a better sort.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. and gallant Gentleman is discussing the Resolution as a whole. We have not arrived at that point yet. The only question now is whether Bills which, in the opinion of the promoters, may lead to the formation of subordinate Parliaments are to be kept here or sent upstairs.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD said he understood that, and he would not pursue the question as to the proper remedy.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said they had received from the Chief Secretary for Ireland a reply which was satisfactory as to the immediate measure which the Government proposed to introduce for Ireland, but it did not go far enough for himself and his friends. They held that all measures in the future which were so important that the Government themselves said they were intended to lead up to a separate Parliament were measures which ought automatically to be excepted from consideration by Grand Committee. His right hon. friend had moved an Amendment, but there was no reply from the front Government bench. He asked whether Bills of the class mentioned by his right hon. friend were not of such importance that they ought to be retained in the House. He fancied that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman to whom the question was addressed would probably be, "Yes, they are, and we do not intend that those measures should go upstairs." If that was so, why did the Government object to accept the Amendment? Why not put it in black and white in the Standing Order? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to accept the Amendment.

SIR FRANCIS LOWE (Birmingham, Edgbaston) said the alteration of the Rules of procedure should not be treated as a Party question. In the circumstances he was rather surprised that the Prime Minister had not met in a more conciliatory spirit the valid and reasonable objections to some of the proposals. He himself was in favour of a further extension of the principle of referring to Standing Committees some of the details of non-controversial measures, and if these alterations could be made in that spirit he would be disposed to support the Government in regard to a great many of them. It had been conclusively shown that a Bill of the character referred to in the Amendment did not come at all within that description. Any Bill which proposed to make an extensive alteration in the Constitution of the United Kingdom would be of a highly controversial nature. He thought, therefore, that was a class of Bill which might very well be excepted from the operation of the Rule. He appealed to the Prime Minister to say whether he could not introduce some general words which would exclude from the operation of the Rule Bills of a highly controversial character. He thought the present case would be entirely met if the right hon. Gentleman would include in the exceptions any Bill making any vital alteration in the Constitution of the United Kingdom. That would not in any way prejudice the position of the Government, because they had declared that they had no intention to send to the Grand Committees Bills of that character. The matter was of far too great importance to be left to the discretion of any Government. Now was the time for the Prime Minister to be a little conciliatory.

Lord WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) believed there were a great many Bills not of a highly contentious character which might fairly be discussed, and which might perhaps receive fairer treatment, in the Grand Committees than in Committee of the Whole House. That was partly owing to the fact that in order to vote Members had to be present at the moment the Question was put. On the other hand, he felt that a strong case had been made out for the acceptance of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member. It seemed to him that this method of sending upstairs Bills of all descriptions relating to different parts of the United Kingdom contained within it a great danger. He had listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, who was particularly anxious to show that in Scotland during the last twenty or more years the great mass of political opinion had been democratic. But he would remind the House that there had been in the past a different position in that country from that which now obtained. When the question of setting up Committees composed of Members for Scotland, Ireland, and Wales was first introduced the Liberal Party was in power, but commanded only a small majority, largely composed of Irish, Welsh, and Scottish Members, while the great proportion of the Members of the House were strongly Conservative Englishmen. That would happen again in the future, and he well remembered the late Lord Randolph Churchill pointing out that if they were going to set up Grand Committees for Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, they must give the same rights to England.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is a proposition down on the Paper later dealing with that point.

Lord WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY said what he wanted to urge was that the proposals of the Government would create a feeling in the country that they were advancing towards Home Rule all round —a principle which, he believed, would never be accepted by the majority of the people.

Colonel KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said he presumed that right hon. Gentlemen opposite would admit that all the members of the Government should be accepted as promoters of the Bills mentioned in the King's Speech. The reason why he was strongly induced to support the Amendment of his hon. and gallant friend was that he thought it would have some considerable effect in putting an end to an unfortunate habit which had grown up in the country and was particularly noticeable at the last general election, namely, that of different members of the Government having different views as to Bills that were to be introduced. Sometimes it was found convenient for one member of the Government to declare that a certain Bill would not have the effect which some people imagined it would have; and another member of the Government, or possibly the same member, addressing another audience, would give an entirely different rendering of the effect of the Bill if passed. The proposal of his hon. and gallant friend would stop a great deal of loose talking and tend in the direction which he was sure the Government had in view—the retaining within the purview of the Whole House of such Bills as were set forth in the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University) desired to say a few words on the Amendment, not with a hope of carrying conviction to hon. Members opposite, but because he wished to record his protest against carrying rules which he believed would be detrimental to the well-being of the House. What were the arguments urged by the Government for excluding from the purview of these Committees the very important matters which were included in the Amendment of his right hon. friend? They were referred again and again to the Report of the Procedure Committee of 1886, and that in fact was the only reason which the right hon. Gentleman had advanced for refusing to give attention to proposals to exclude matters of national or constitutional importance from the consideration of these Committees. The fact was, however, that the Report of that Committee had very little application to the present situation. What Committees did that Committee propose to set up under that Report? They were not ad hoc Committees, but the House was to be divided into four Committees who were to meet, each forming a quarter of the whole House, for the discussion of matters which were to come back to the House for discussion upon Report. That was a very different matter from the appointment of Committees ad hoc of sixty or eighty Members. In 1886 they had not realised the full effect of the legislation of 1885; they had not realised that the Redistribution Act of that year would work out in such a way that the elections might give to one Party or another a majority in the country quite out of proportion to the votes cast for it. He did not think the Report of that Committee was framed in anticipation of the enormous majorities which placed great and dangerous powers in the hands of a Government. Then again, closure, in those days, was in its infancy, and the idea of closure by compartments had not been introduced. If they wished to accelerate the business of the House he would venture to say that closure by compartments, determined upon in the initial stages of a Bill, was the best way to secure a full and reasonable discussion of the important parts. At that time, however, closure by compartments had not been considered, and, as he had said, closure in the ordinary form was in its infancy. At that time there was certainly no suggestion of the power of closure being given to the Chairman of any one of the four Committees which were contemplated in the Report of the Committee of 1886. That being so, the Report of that Committee was really inapplicable to the present situation. What other reasons for rejecting this Amendment had been assigned by the Government? Did they mean to send up as a matter of course these ad hoc Committees' Bills dealing with the great subjects which had been alluded to, or did they consider that it was beyond the range of possibility that a Home Rule Bill, or a Bill for the cession of territory or the like, should be sent up? If they considered it impossible why did they not say so? If they would say so, he did not wish to express any doubt as to the intentions of the Government, or to bring himself under the rebuke of the Chancellor of the Duchy, but this Government had taught them that a great many things were possible that they had hardly conceived to be within the range of possibility before the commencement of the session last year. Was it to be left within the range of possibility that such a Bill as the Home Rule Bill of 1893, that a Bill to carry out a commercial treaty—say the Sugar Convention Bill or the Bill for the cession of Heligoland—was to be dealt with by a Committee of sixty or eighty Members, upon which the Opposition might be very sparsely represented? Moreover, he would ask under what conditions the Government would allow the possibility of such a discussion to take place? These Committees would discuss matters without any authentic report being given of their proceedings. The Chairman would have given to him freely a power of closure which had only been gradually granted to the Speaker and the Chairman of Committees in the House, and was only given to the Deputy-Speaker now with a reservation. The public would not only know nothing or practically nothing of the course of the debate, but they would not know the reasons for which closure was given or the circumstances under which the debate had been curtailed, and they would have no means of judging of what had been the extent of the fair discussion allowed: this would depend on the idiosyncrasies of the particular Chairman of a particular Committee on a question of constitutional importance. They had heard in the course of the debate the sort of view which the Government took of these Committees, and it appeared that so long as a Committee did what the Government pleased and carried out its intentions they might alter the Constitution of the country and cede territory, make commercial treaties, and so on. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No, no."] These Grand Committees, as he understood it, were to have free power to deal with any subject, with the very limited exceptions included in the right hon. Gentleman's Rules, which might be sent before them.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs) said the hon. Gentleman must not say that the Committee had this power of proceeding. The House of Commons had still some power somewhere. A Bill must be read a second time in the House, and then there was the Report stage and the Third Reading. The hon. Baronet was exaggerating.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said he could assure the Prime Minister that he was quite familiar with the forms of the House, and had the right hon. Gentleman heard the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy he would have understood the purport of what he was then saying, which was not intended to be in disparagement of the ordinary procedure of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy was asked what would be the attitude of the Government when the Committee went against them on a question which the Government said was a vital one? The Chancellor of the Duchy said the action of the Committee would be remedied when the measure came down to the House; the Government would turn on its engine and upset the decision of the Committee. What, therefore, he wanted to point out was that it was rather a contradiction that a Committee of eighty Members might have the management of that very important stage, which was in the view of the country the most important stage of a Bill, they might have full power to deal with questions of the highest importance, but if they outstepped for one moment the wishes of the Government or lagged behind them the Government would not regard their decisions as vital, but they were to be set aside at once on the Report stage. There was in the contemplated procedure a possible arbitrary curtailment of debate by the powers of using the closure given to a possibly partisan Chairman. There was also a denial of publicity which he could hardly think the Government would wish to maintain. In fact, there would be no official report of these proceedings and no knowledge of the circumstances under which the closure was applied. He would also ask what would be the effect upon the general business of the House if these Committees were to deal with these very important subjects, which might come up every session, sometimes in several Bills. They would have four Committees of eighty Members, possibly one dealing with Home Rule, another with a commercial treaty, a third with the cession of territory, and a fourth with the reconstitution of the Army. These Committees would sit from eleven o'clock in the morning to four o'clock in the afternoon, and he would like to ask with what heart or energy would the members of those Committees come down to the discussion of a complicated Finance Bill, or the Report stage of a Bill hurried through the Committee by means of the closure upstairs, in the crude form in which Bills had in times within very recent recollection come down to that House. Unless some limit was put upon the subjects which might come before these Committees the business of the House might possibly fall into two sets of hands, those who attended Grand Committees and those who did not, and the ordinary items of discussion on administration and finance, and the subjects which would not be brought before the Grand Committees, including the Report stages of the Bills, would be dealt with mainly by the men who came fresh to work at four o'clock, and would be treated in a half-hearted way, if at all, by the jaded voluptuaries of Parliamentary work who had been sitting upstairs from eleven to four. He was afraid that the Government, in their desire to secure legislation which they wanted, were really doing a permanent injury to the House, and he appealed to the Prime Minister to reconsider that aspect of the question. The House was not merely a legislative machine, but the country looked to it for information on great political questions and for the best criticism that could be given on the conduct of the Government in all Departments of the State. The country also looked to the House for the best that could be learned of the details of all important measures before the House. That the country would not obtain if they worked the greater portion of the House to a standstill before four o'clock in the afternoon, and if they concealed from the public the discussion which took place in Committee on the Bills which were dealt with between eleven and four. The whole scope of the exceptions put forward by the Government was, to his mind, most disappointing and most unsatisfactory to anyone who cared, as he ventured to say he cared, for the due conduct of business in, and the high reputation of, the House. It had been his lot at one time or another to make some study of the institutions of the country, and he had studied them with admiration, and he would even add with reverence, and it was to him a matter of regret that he should see this Government, so strong in ability, so inordinately strong in numbers, stifling debate and trampling on legitimate opposition in order to carry Rules which he believed would gravely, if not irretrievably, impair the dignity, diminish the usefulness, and lower the reputation of the House.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he thanked his right hon. friend for the little compliment he had paid the Government. He was glad, and it was quite refreshing to find that anyone thought well of the Government at all after the sort of Whip which had been sent round to an admiring flock, to the effect that they were physically unable to sit up late at night, and mentally incapable of explaining or defending their scheme for strangling free debate in the House. If that was the gospel that had been preached behind the curtain for months past to the flock on the other side by their pastor and master, he was surprised that it should occur to one of the hon. Members opposite to use the words "most able." The superlative quite startled him. The hon. Baronet, if he would allow him to say so, had fallen into the error which had been proved to exist in all the speeches made on the Amendments moved upon the general question. If hon. Members were allowed to go according to their own sweet wills on such an occasion, it was a case of "Unconscious of their doom, the little victims play." They had so many hours in which they might employ themselves very usefully in discussing questions which deserved to be discussed, such as the question relating to the Scottish Committee. But, no, they preferred to play. As he had said, the hon. Baronet seemed to have fallen into an error which was saturated with fallacy. He talked of a Committee ad hoc. No doubt he had been so long at the Education Department, and when there had got so used to the phrase against which he protested, that it had so got into his mind that he must use it. The hon. Baronet called these Committees ad hoc, but they were nothing of the kind. Originally there was a distinction between the Committee on Trade and that on Law, but that had long since ceased to have effect and had disappeared. The hon. Member said what a dreadful thing it would be to have Bills dealing with treaties, Conventions, or other international arrangements, or Bills dealing with the cession of territory, referred to these Committees. Here he came to the little element of appositeness which he could find in the speech of the hon. Member. He had ventured to interrupt him and to point out that it was not the Committee but the House which sanctioned these things, because the latter passed the Second Reading, and therefore, if something prejudicial was enacted, the House would be as much to blame as the Committee. As a matter of fact, Bills which involved the cession of territory were not always very complicated. When Heligoland was ceded, the Bill only contained two clauses, one of which contained the short title, and the other simply provided for the assent of Parliament to the agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Emperor of Germany as set forth in the schedule of the Bill, and set out that it should be lawful for the late Queen to do anything which was necessary or proper to carry into effect those provisions. The hon. Member seemed to think that they should exclude a Bill of that kind from going to any Committee, and that it ought to be reserved for careful and elaborate consideration by the House which had already assented to the principle of the measure as a whole. As to this Amendment, he founded himself on the legal maxim exclusio unius est inclusio alterius. If this Rule were passed, and went beyond excluding the traditional financial measures from the consideration of Grand Committees, it might be taken to involve that having specified those Bills all others were to go upstairs. That was not their intention, because they said that each Bill ought to be decided upon its merits. There might be Army Bills so exceedingly large and subversive of the existing condition of things that they ought to be considered in the House, but there might be others of such a slight character that they might not be excluded from the ordinary course. They must decide upon the merits of the case in each instance. It was said that that meant that the Government were to determine in each case, but he disclaimed the notion that their idea was to pass certain Bills which they liked. Let that be understood. Their object was to pass Bills with better consideration and greater speed than could be done at present; whether they regarded the Bills as good or bad did not enter into the matter at all. What he said was that the present system was cumbrous, slow, and ineffective. He had admitted from the first that this was a sweeping change. If it succeeded, as he hoped it would, and they had every reason to think it would, it would, he thought, make a great reform in the system of the House. It was not intended to, and he did not think it would, have the effect of benefiting one Party more than another. It was proposed merely to facilitate legislation and to assist the House in the discharge of its legislative duties. He had opposed all these special exceptions because if once, as he had said, they began to accept them they might exclude other matters which were as worthy of being excepted as those before them. He believed that it ought to be possible at the time for those best qualified to judge and who had the actual measures before them to say what the exceptions should be, but he thought it would be ill-advised to lay down any hard and fast rule as to the Bills or clauses which were to be excluded from the operation of the Rule.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said the right hon. Gentleman was not making the Standing Order for this Government only, but was making it in what he conceived to be the interests of legislation over a period of years. He had introduced it in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the present House of Commons, or in the interests of the majority of any other House of Commons. He could only express regret that the Prime Minister's passionate desire to see legislation expedited, even though it was of a kind with which he did not sympathise, did not find expression in the last two Parliaments. He did not recall any occasion, when the late Government were dealing with the Rules of Procedure or bringing in their Bills, on which the Prime Minister had expressed his passionate desire to facilitate legislation, even though he might not approve of it, provided it had secured the support of the majority of the House. If that were, as he did not doubt it to be, the object of the Prime Minister and the Government, it was not the object with which some supporters were supporting the new Rule. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had frankly declared that his object was to pass Liberal legislation—Liberal in the Party sense; and the right hon Gentleman the Member for Rushcliffe had said very much the same thing the other day. For his own part he desired to see the House more capable of directing its business than in the past when the legislation was supported by a great majority, and, at the same time, he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite were making a great mistake when they supposed that the Opposition did not wish to see legislation carried. In the past, when they commanded a majority, they had been active legislators, and they would be active legislators when they crossed the floor. Then no doubt they would reap any benefits which these Rules might give for the conduct of legislation through the House. It was not because these Rules facilitated legislation that he objected to them; it was because he thought that they would impede the proper consideration of legislation by the House, and be used, as the Government had already expressed the intention of using them, and as other Governments would use them increasingly, to withdraw power and control from that House. So much for the latter portion of the Prime Minister's speech. His hon. friend beside him had at last succeeded in extracting from the Prime Minister the principle on which they proceeded in drafting their Standing Order. He founded himself upon the legal maxim, Exclusio unius est inclusio alterius. That would have been a good argument if the Prime Minister had not excluded the financial Bills in accordance with immemorial practice. What the right hon. Gentleman said now was that he had excluded them because they had always been exceptionally treated by the House. But the two things were not the same. It would be in accordance with immemorial practice not to send contentious Bills upstairs, but the Prime Minister said he did mean to send such measures upstairs. The Prime Minister excluded finance Bills because they had always been exceptionally treated; yes, but not on the Committee stage. The special treatment of finance Bills was merely, in fact, that they must be founded on Resolutions introduced in Committee of Ways and Means and reported to the House. The procedure on finance Bills was applicable to all Bills with italicised clauses in them. Accordingly the distinction which the Prime Minister had drawn to differentiate finance Bills from other Bills broke down, because it had no reference to the particular stage which they were engaged in discussing. The right hon. Gentleman founded himself on a maxim which proved their case, and, if they passed the Rule in its present form, they had no security, whatever might be the intentions of the present Government, that they would not in future have a wide extension of the practice of sending Bills upstairs, and he, for one thought it not only possible but probable that such an extension would be made. Their only safeguard, if they meant to protect the right of the House to discuss these Bills in Committee of the Whole House, was to say definitely that they should be retained, and to say it definitely, not only in the form of speeches or intentions expressed across the floor of the House, but by words inserted in the Standing Order.

MR. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid.) said that, from the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, if the Amendment were incorporated, it would be necessary to incorporate also, as an Amendment, something to provide for every clause which it was thought necessary or desirable, on the other side of the House, should be dealt with in Committee of the Whole House. That was not the scheme of the Government. What they were casting about for was some device whereby the House of Commons might become a business assembly. It was not to take away from the House a privilege which it might have upon the Committee stage; it sought to relieve the House of that business stage on a Bill. The general scheme of the Rule was that the Committee stage should disappear as regarded many Bills which could be dealt with more effectively upstairs than in Committee of the Whole House. If the Government were to adopt any Amendment or suggestion such as that under consideration, it would be necessary to incorporate in the Rule every class of Bill which it was desired to keep in the House. Of course that would not be practicable. ["Why?"] He would tell them why. They had on the Paper at the present moment Amendments which would include all highly controversial Bills. Nobody yet understood how these four Grand Committees were going to work. Everybody knew that this was an experiment. The Prime Minister had already said that he believed the experiment would turn out to be a good one. It was in the recollection of everyone that changes in Procedure had always been objected to. There was always a conservative tendency in the House of Commons—he did not mean in the Party sense—which went against making any alteration in the Rules; but alterations had been made which had turned out to be good and effectual remedies for the state of things against which they were aimed. He wanted to assume for the moment that this experiment of Grand Committees would turn out to be a good one. The Amendment before the House was to exclude expressly from the Rule a particular class of Bills.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University): I would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that it does not take away the power to make a Motion to send the Bill upstairs.

MR. EVANS was not at all sure that the right hon. Gentleman was right, for the Rule said in terms that they must keep in the whole House a certain class of Bills; he assumed that was definite. If the plan turned out to be successful, as he believed it would, then the House ought to be free to let every Bill without exception go upstairs. It seemed to be forgotten that there would still remain to the House the various stages of a Bill—the First and Second Readings, the Report stage, and the Third Reading. In all conscience was not that enough for practical discussion? It was only in respect of details that the Committees would be employed. He did not say that his side of the House had been guiltless in the matter, but it was perfectly certain that the Committee stage in the House had been often used, not for the purpose of improving a Bill, not for the purpose of bringing to bear upon that stage the business faculty of the House, but for the purpose of preventing the Bill from passing. It was to prevent a repetition of these things that this procedure had been proposed, and he was very glad that the Government were setting their face against all the exceptions which were proposed to be put into the Rule.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the hon. Gentleman had forgotten one thing. He had stated with perfect truth that the Committee stage had often been used in the past for the purpose of prolonging discussion. Nobody with any knowledge of the House of Commons denied that that had been the case in the past, or would doubt that analogous practices would be heard of in the future. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had made the great mistake of supposing that it could be avoided by withdrawing the details of Bills from the cognisance of the House. That was an impossible proceeding, and the Government, to do them justice, did not themselves contemplate it. They felt that the details must at one stage or another be thoroughly discussed in the House, and they had by an Amendment on the Paper expressed their intention of making, at any rate, some approximation on the Report stage to the freedom which was given on the Committee stage. The Prime Minister at an earlier period of the discussion had practically told the House that he meant to give full liberty on the Report stage. Therefore, they were all agreed that there must be a stage on every Bill in the House itself on which there could be ample discussion, and on which obstruction would be possible, and would, under certain circumstances, human nature being what it was, be practised. Nothing in the Rule would or could prevent that being done on one stage of the Bill, if the House of Commons had any control over the details of the measure. They were all agreed as to that. But they were all agreed, also, that there ought not to be two stages of the Bill in the House on which these practices could take place. He contended that limitations upon the powers of the House should be on the Report stage and not on the Committee stage. They were all agreed that the House should retain the liberty of dealing with details which ought to be dealt with when the Government were in a position to make proper changes consequent upon discussion. In regard to the practice of sending Bills upstairs, they would find that instead of making the two stages supplement each other, what was done under the limitations of a Committee upstairs would often hamper the House in the work to be done on the Report stage. It could be shown with conclusive mathematical certainty that the manning of these Committees must be of an imperfect character, and even if it were perfect they would not carry authority. The result would be that the House would come fresh to the matter unfettered by anything which had been done upstairs, they would refuse to be bound by the decisions of the Standing Committees, and would refuse to allow the fact that the details had been threshed out upstairs to diminish the discussion which they thought necessary downstairs. While he agreed that there should be some limitation to the double opportunity of dealing with the details of a Bill, they could not give that power without at the same time giving some opportunities for obstruction. The longer the discussion went on the more he was convinced that the Government had taken a wrong course in dealing with the Committee stage in the way proposed. The proper course would have been to leave the House a reasonable liberty on the Committee stage, and cut down to the narrowest possible limits the power of spending time—and sometimes wasting it—upon the Report stage.

*Sir HENRY FOWLER said that one matter which had not been mentioned was even worse than obstruction, and that was that Bills had been and would be obstructed not on their merits or demerits but to prevent some other Bill being reached. They had to leave it to the House to decide whether the plan of the Government for dealing with the details through the machinery of Grand Committees should be more generally carried out, or whether they should still go on with the old system and either do away with the Report stage or reduce it to a very small truncated stage. They had been talking about grave constitutional changes which the House wanted to reserve power to deal with. He had no fear whatever upon that point, because he was satisfied that the House would take good care of itself and would not endeavour to carry through Grand Committee any Bill upon which public opinion had been strongly excited. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London in his evidence before the Committee upstairs said—

> "It seems to me that a great blot, the greatest of all blots, upon our procedure at this moment is the fact that session after session goes by, and Bills to which nobody, or, at any rate, very few really object on their merits are handed on from session to session, and perhaps from Government to Government, without becoming law. No political credit is to be got out of them, no Government gains by them or loses by them, and the only people who lose are the public or the public service; and the Opposition of the day, or a few individuals even on the Government side, are quite sufficient to stop those Bills from getting through, if they have to run the ordeal of the Committee stage, the Report stage, and all the rest of them."

That was absolutely true. His opinion of these Rules was that they presented a reasonable prospect of dealing with Departmental Bills of the greatest importance to local and general administration which were outside Party questions, and by which no Party gained or lost, although the public lost by their not being passed into law.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) moved an Amendment to exempt from the operation of the Standing Order Bills affecting the Constitution of any of the Colonies or their relations with this country. In spite of the fate of the previous Amendment he had still some hope that the Government would accept this Amendment. There had never been any great change in the Constitution of any Colony which had not been preceded by a long period of agitation. He instanced the cases of Canada and Australia, where the Colonies had had every opportunity of discussing constitutional changes from every standpoint many years before they were carried into effect. The proposals were thrashed out in presence of the public. Let them imagine a Bill for the federation of South Africa being brought to that House and being sent upstairs to a Committee. The Chancellor of the Duchy would say that the Government would naturally not send such a Bill upstairs. But the Government by their present action were putting bounds upon what might be called the liberties of private Members of the House, because in a Committee upstairs the whole House would not be represented. The Government in the proposed Standing Order said in effect: "Though Bills may go upstairs automatically, we reserve to ourselves the right to retain certain Bills, if we choose, for the consideration of the House in Committee." There were a great many in the House who thought that the power of the Executive was increasing beyond reason. To whatever Party the Government of the day might belong, he thought it wholly unwise to allow it discretion to say whether Bills of this sort should be sent upstairs to the Grand Committees. As a matter of high constitutional procedure he thought it should be put on record that Bills dealing with the Constitution of the Colonies or the relations of the Colonies to the Mother Country should be reserved for the consideration of the Whole House. What would the Prime Ministers of the self-governing Colonies think if they were told that it was in the discretion of the Government in power in this country to send a Bill dealing with the Constitution of their own nation to a Commitee of eighty members upstairs, where the debates would not be reported, and where there would not be the same opportunity for the expression of divergent views as in that House? He thought that to leave this discretion to the Government of the day would be, though unintentional, an indignity to the Colonies. If the present Government would not send such Bills upstairs, did they trust future Governments not to do so? [AN HON. MEMBER: Not if they are Tory.] The hon. Member below the gangway had helped him in his argument. He wanted to remove it from the discretion of any Government. We were in the fortunate position in this country of having an unwritten Constitution, but in the United States it would take seven or ten years to alter the Constitution. Bills might deal with matters vital to the welfare, the national life, and the future of the Colonies, and the House should allow no discretion whatever to the Government in such matters. If the opinion of the Prime Ministers of the self-governing Colonies were asked, their reply would be in consonance with his own opinion, that questions affecting their Constitution should be reserved for the consideration of the Whole House. Bills vitally affecting the relations of this country with the Colonies should be put in that high treasury of procedure which reserved the consideration of such matters for the Whole House. He begged to move.

*MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn), in seconding the Amendment, said he was afraid that the House would not accept it after the speech which the Prime Minister had made. The right hon. Gentleman had practically said that they must accept the proposed alterations as they stood, or leave them, for no Amendment moved on that side of the House would be acceptable to him or his Party. The right hon. Gentleman had forgotten what took place in the House in 1882, when Mr. Gladstone moved the appointment of two Standing Committees, one Bills relating to law and shipping, and the other for trade, commerce and manufactures. Mr. Gladstone then stated that there must be some Bills dealing with Imperial Questions which it would be improper to refer to the Committees upstairs, and that ought to be retained for Committee of the Whole House. On that occasion Mr. Gladstone strongly deprecated any idea of forcing through the House by closure or otherwise any drastic changes in the Rules, and described such a course as "inexcusable and stupid." That was the very course which the Prime Minister was following that night. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Gravesend dealt with Bills affecting the constitution of the Colonies or their relations with this country.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth) asked if the Amendment included Crown Colonies?

*MR. REMNANT said he included the self-governing Colonies. The Colonies were not, at the time referred to, so strongly in the minds of the people of this country as they were to-day. In a speech made at the Colonial Conference the previous day one of the Premiers said that the sittings of the Conference should be held in public in order that a correct statement of its proceedings should be accessible to those who lived in the Colonies; but if the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman was carried out, and such Bills were sent to a Committee upstairs, there would be no authoritative report of the proceedings. Hon. Members knew how difficult it was to find out any authoritative statement as to what had taken place in Committees upstairs, and those who lived in the Colonies would find still greater difficulty. He hoped that the House and the Government would acknowledge that this was a reasonable Amendment and accept it.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words '(c) or Bills affecting the constitution of any of the Colonies or their relations with this country.'"—(Sir Gilbert Parker.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby) moved to insert in the Amendment after the word "their," the words "civil or military." If the Government had any intention of accepting the Amendment—and he supposed there could be no objection to that—he thought it would be better if the words he had suggested were added in order to emphasise the real reason for excluding this type of measure from being sent to a Grand Committee. It had occurred in the past that the lack of discussion on military proposals had caused difficulties in the Colonies. In Bills relating to civil and Army matters the fundamental difficulties only arose in Committee; a former Secretary for War had experience of that, the fact that the Colonial Premiers did not understand the details of the proposals made in Committee having led to some bitterness, or at any rate to some feeling. Speaking with great respect as one who had only seven years experience of the House, he thought it would be highly undesirable that an Army Bill should be discussed in Grand Committee, because all such Bills must affect all the Colonies in different degrees. It might be said that the Army Bill now before the House for the formation of a Territorial Army did not affect the Colonies, but it ultimately would have an influence on what the Colonies would do in regard to their Territorial Army. It would be remembered that in 1902 the Colonial Premiers had never plainly realised the difficulties of the proposals which had been appealed to them. The one thing which had hindered our relations with the Colonies in the past had been not the lack of discussion, but the lack of publicity of that discussion.

MR. AUSTIN TAYLOR, in seconding the Amendment, said he wished it had gone a little further. The hon. and gallant Member only proposed to insert the words "civil and military," but no one knew better than he the inter-dependence of the Naval and Military forces in the defence of the Colonies. He therefore suggested that his hon. and gallant friend should include "naval" as well as "civil and military" in his Amendment. He thought that in any discussions in the House affecting the defence of the Empire as a whole it was eminently desirable that the Bills should be discussed in Committee of the Whole House, and not in Committee upstairs.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"After the word 'their,' to insert the words 'civil or military.'"—(Major Seely.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. LYTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square) said he would have liked the Government to have replied to the arguments in favour of the Amendment from the Opposition side of the House and from two respected adherents of their own. For his own part he thought that the really important question was whether the exemptions from the Rule should be in matters affecting the relations of the Colonies with the Imperial Government. His hon. friend the Member for Gravesend had spoken of the years of agitation which had preceded the establishment of the Dominion of Canada and of the Commonwealth of Australia, and had dwelt on the effect that would have been produced in Canada and Australia if the Bills for constituting the Dominion and the Commonwealth had been discussed not in Committee of the Whole House, but in Committee upstairs, where the Colonies would not have been able to obtain any detailed information on a subject which had engaged their interest for so many years. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division that the really important matter was publicity. Let them take the analogous case of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council —a most august tribunal. How would that tribunal be regarded by our friends across the seas if they saw it in actual session? They would see a dusty room in which a few elderly gentlemen were gathered round a table. They would hear able arguments, but they would not consider that the great Imperial Court of the Empire was sufficiently august in appearance in dealing with matters which might affect them. Supposing an Australian were to visit this country at the time of the passage of a great constitutional measure affecting the colony, would he think it seemly or consistent with the dignity of the subject, to see a Bill which had exercised his country for five years being discussed and settled, practically irrevocably, in Committee-room No. 15 by thirty or forty Gentlemen, with no official report. That was not at all an imaginary picture by any means. Surely it would be deplorable that, while a cricket match would be reported at great length, through the cables, the details of a great constitutional measure affecting the Colonies should be relegated to a Committee upstairs.

MR. DALZIEL said he could not see that there was any case made out for the exemption of Colonial Bills, because if any serious matters arose those Bills would come within the category of Bills which the Government of the day were to consider as to whether they should stay in that House or go upstairs. He could not understand the complaint with regard to the want of publicity. At the present time the proceedings in Grand Committees were reported. Reporters were admitted, and the proceedings were reported if they were of public interest. With regard to the general question of reporting, it was a question for the Government to consider whether they ought not to have official reports of these Committees. There would doubtless be many occasions when it might be necessary to refer to what had taken place in the Committees; to what the Minister in charge of a Bill upstairs had said; to what was actually done and what the issue was upon which a division was taken. It was well worth consideration, therefore, whether there ought not to be an official report of all the Grand Committees. He did not think this Amendment should be accepted.

Viscount HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) said he would not have intervened if the Government had taken the more usual course on these occasions of answering the arguments urged against them not only by the Opposition but by some of their own supporters. Had it not been for the statement of the Prime Minister that it was his intention not to accept any Amendment to the proposed Standing Orders, he could not have conceived that the Government would refuse this Amendment. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had truly said that this Amendment was of no greater importance than other Amendments of a similar character which had been proposed. The astonishing thing to the Opposition was that the Prime Minister had not accepted the other important Amendments. The Government had great confidence in their own wisdom. That was a confidence which they could not expect the Opposition to share, because it was not shared even by all members of the Government Party. The Opposition did, however, trust the Government in this matter. What they felt was that they could not say what the action of future Governments might be. The right hon. Gentleman might be able to pledge his Government not to send any Colonial Bill upstairs, but he could not pledge future Governments. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy had recently said that these Committees could not under any circumstances decide the fate of a Government. That would have to be decided later on when the question at issue came before the House on the Report Stage. If these Committees were incompetent to decide the fate of the Government, they were incompetent to deal with such important questions as were referred to in the Amendment.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he had not thought it necessary to occupy time, because he had only the same Answer that he had given over and over again. The Government could not accept any additional exceptions to the Rule. They refused them all on the same ground, that, if they put in an exception of this sort, they implied that everything else was to go to the Standing Committee, without any alternative. What the Government said was that every question must be dealt with on its merits at the time. There might be many Bills which it would not be desirable to treat otherwise than in Committee of the Whole House. With regard to the picture conjured up by the ingenuity of the late Secretary of State for the Colonies of the New Zealander sitting on a broken arch of Westminster Bridge and viewing with contempt the shabby arrangements made for dealing with Bills from his own country, he need only point out that if there was any force in the consideration it would be for a future Government to give effect to it.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness) asked for an Answer to the Question as to whether an official report would be made of the proceedings in the Committees and circulated in Hansard.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that that had nothing to do with the Amendment.

Sir GILBERT PARKER said he would accept the Amendment of his hon. friend.

Proposed words there inserted in the proposed Amendment.

Question put, "That those words, as amended, be there inserted."
